

THE MOONLIT APPRENTICE

AUGUST 21, 2026

I began the dream
as a humanoid black
sheep-dragon—an impossible hybrid
even by were-creature
standards.

Black wool covered
my sheep-like body,
while enormous
dragon wings
unfolded behind me.

Still disoriented,
I trusted the sky
and flew above
a wooded medieval
world.

Below, an armored
wolf knight lowered
his lance and decided what I must be.

A knight with a wolf-like head, wearing blue and silver plate armor, is riding a brown horse. He is hurling a long lance towards a winged creature in the sky. The creature has dark, bat-like wings and a body covered in dark, curly wool. The background shows a sunset over a landscape with a castle in the distance.

The knight
hurled his jousting
lance directly
at me.

A close-up of the winged creature, showing its dark, bat-like wings and its body covered in dark, curly wool. It is flying against a sunset sky with a castle visible in the background.

I did not dodge.
My wool opened
around the weapon
like a cloud around
an arrow.

A close-up of the lance passing through the dark, curly wool of the creature. The lance is a long wooden shaft with a sharp metal point. The wool is dark and curly, with some small orange sparks visible.

The lance passed through without
blood, pain, or even resistance.

A close-up of the knight's head and shoulders. He is looking up at the winged creature in the sky. The creature is still visible in the background, flying against the sunset sky. The knight's armor is blue and silver.

His weapon had struck
the shape of a sheep-dragon,
but not the deeper thing
I was.

He demanded
to know whether
I was some kind
of elemental.

I answered with fire, and his
protective steel
became an oven
around him.

The wolf escaped
the scalding plates
before they could
cook him alive.

We agreed that
fighting a dragon
while dressed like
a skillet was a
terrible tradition.

Without his armor or weapon, the wolf confessed that he no longer understood his purpose.

Knights were supposed to kill dragons. Wolves were supposed to eat sheep.

I was both, yet he could neither kill me nor consume me.

He had not lost a battle. He had lost the story that told him who to be.

I offered to make him my apprentice and
teach him how
to fly.

He objected that he had no wings.
I explained that
wings were only
the surface.

My sheep nature
connected me to
clouds, and clouds
belonged to the sky.

Power could come
from the deeper
meaning inside what we already were.

I asked what waited beyond the surface of wolfhood.

He looked to the moon—the ancient light that wolves had always answered with a howl.

He chose that connection, and silver moonlight poured through his dark-brown fur.

Pale, radiant, and still wingless, my apprentice rose into the air.

His first flight
began as a
startled stumble
into the sky.

Then the
moonlit wolf
found his balance
and flew beside me.

Predator and prey,
knight and dragon—
none of those
surface roles could contain us.

We became what we chose by embracing the
deeper cosmos
within who we already were.

