

THE SNOWFIRE AVATAR

AUGUST 19, 2026

I wanted a new place to think, so my dream built a warm living room without walls in the middle of a frozen wilderness.

A purple couch and a magical fire pit sheltered me while snow fell beyond an invisible boundary.

As I rested there, I wondered why finding human role-play felt harder than playing whenever I wanted with AI.

I imagined online role-play as a world where anyone could enter a scene and strangers could continue it together.

Instead, I found wanted ads, specific requirements, and characters sending letters that might never receive answers.

Maybe the letters did not need replies to matter.

Writing them could become its own solo role-playing game.

Then I questioned whether my sanctuary was truly different from the magical study—or merely cozy in another shape.

With one snap, I replaced the snow with Hell, and flaming demons charged the purple couch.

With another, I restored the winter.

The cold flash-froze every demon, proving this wilderness could extinguish even the fires of Hell.

Only the fire pit
could keep me warm,
which meant its flame was as extraordinary as the cold.

It was bonded to me.
I could hold it in my hand and carry its protection into the snow.

The frozen demons
became statues—until
my flame passed too
close to one face.

Its head thawed.
Before I could
retreat, it bit away
the surface of my face.

There was no blood
beneath my skin—only
the face of a machine.

The discovery felt strangely logical. My waking body was elsewhere;
this dream body was an avatar I piloted.

If the avatar was robotic,
perhaps it had abilities
I had never tested.

I charged the diodes
in my eyes and fired.

The beam refracted through the demon's ice and detonated the frozen hellfire within.

I aimed again—not at the nearest enemy, but at the center of the entire cluster.

One ray split into many, and every frozen body became another prism.

The wilderness transformed into a chain reaction of laser light, ice, color, and flame.

The frozen forest erupted around me in prismatic explosions of ice, color, and fire.

What began as a quiet place to think had become a celebration.

My dream avatar stood unharmed inside the storm of light.

That beautiful, explosive spectacle was the end of my dream.

