

WHAT I MAKE

I induced lucidity through sleep paralysis and entered the same Storyverse continuity I had explored since June 11, 2025.

I found myself inside a friendly, sentient, wood-paneled jacuzzi in the middle of the Arctic.

The air was bitterly cold, but the water around me was perfectly warm, and the jacuzzi seemed devoted to helping me relax.

I wondered whether simply sitting still might feel dull beside all my superhero adventures.

The jacuzzi understood. Hover pads awakened beneath us, and together we rose toward the Aurora Borealis.

We flew directly into the northern lights, through long green and pink tendrils that curved across the sky like glowing blood vessels.

The aurora separated around us like luminous cotton candy, then shifted and formed itself again.

Because the light was electromagnetic, a gentle tingling sensation moved across my skin whenever we passed through it.

Orchestral music rose from below, where an armed steampunk war train raced across the frozen landscape.

I did not know who was fighting or why, but the train suddenly began firing at us.

I wanted no part in their war,
so I asked the jacuzzi to climb beyond the train's firing range.

A cowboy on a flying steampunk horse pursued us and fired a musket that wounded both me and the jacuzzi.

I drew my rainbow Sword of Light and created a barrier that blocked more shots while healing the damage already done.

When he refused to leave us alone, I connected my golden energy tether to his gear-driven horse.

The magical bond let me interface with the analog machine as if I were hacking a computer.

I activated the horse's self-destruct system, ended the pursuit, and continued toward peace instead of joining the battle.

Eventually, the jacuzzi carried me to a living room floating freely in the sky.

Three walls were missing, so its couch and television stood almost completely open to the clouds.

I climbed out, sat on the couch, and considered different ways I could relax.

Instead of watching television, I opened a notebook stitched from soft pieces of purple felt and summoned a pencil glowing with pink magic.

The blank pages filled me with nostalgic warmth, as though I were sitting beside a fireplace somewhere safe and familiar.

I was not especially skilled at drawing while awake, but a dream did not have the same limitations.

I drew a leafy green stalk with a radiant star where its flower should have been.

Circular bands of sunset color spread from the star, and the pencil drawing became a delicate watercolor layered with ink and sketch details.

Beginning with a blank page and placing a small part of myself onto it felt peaceful and deeply satisfying.

The drawing never needed to be shown to anyone else. It could exist entirely for me, and that alone gave it meaning.

As I considered the value of creating purely for myself, a real plant began growing around my arms.

Its vines, leaves, flowers, and living stems intertwined until they formed a guitar.

The aurora disappeared, and the floating room opened onto a bright blue sky filled with soft pink clouds.

I began playing a song about creation, personal freedom, and the right to decide what belongs inside my own imagination.

Other people might become angry at what someone chooses to make, but their anger does not give them ownership over another person's art.

I sang that private creation was rewarding in itself, because art did not need an audience before it could matter.

Something could remain intimate, personal, and meaningful even when it was created for only one person.

The small picture in my notebook had already changed my experience of the entire sky.

Cry me a river, bleed me a lake.

You can't take or control what I make.

