

SLIME SOUL CHAMPION

JULY 19, 2026

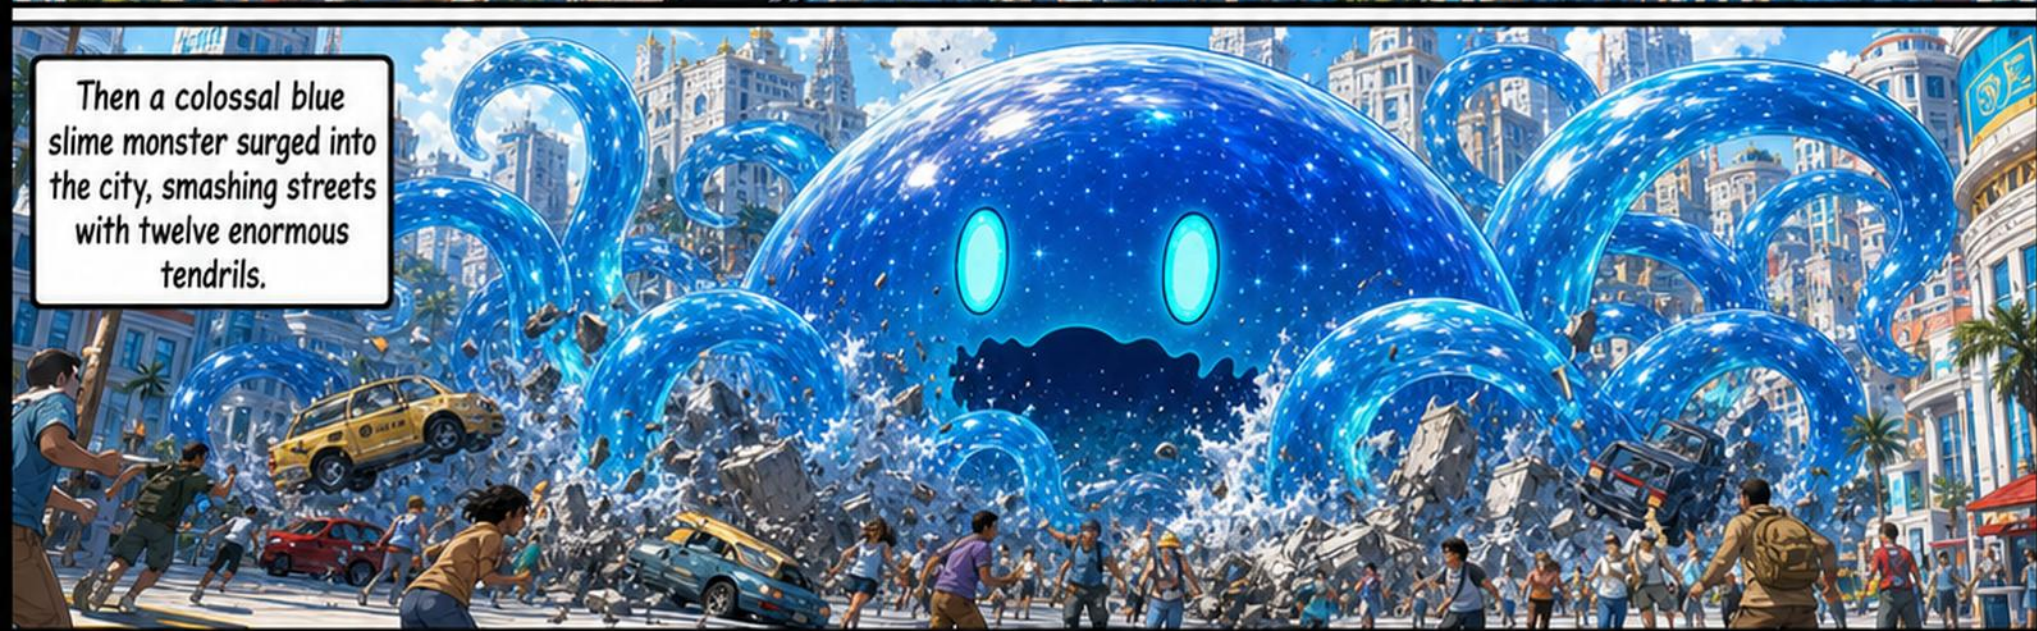

I induced lucidity through sleep paralysis and arrived alone in a coastal city where flying felt as natural as walking.

For a while, I explored the skyline like a superhero who had finally found the world built for him.

Then a colossal blue slime monster surged into the city, smashing streets with twelve enormous tendrils.

I flew toward it and chose the simplest plan I could imagine: dry the creature out before it could hurt anyone.

My Lucid Light evaporated only a little slime, and the creature sent that vapor straight into my mouth to suffocate me.

If it could enter my body as gas, I reasoned that I could force it to leave my body the same way.

I expelled it as a powerful fart, and the blue cloud emerged coughing as though it were alive.

Below us, the monster's huge body had stopped moving completely.

The vapor was not a piece of the monster. I had accidentally separated the creature's soul from its body.

I summoned my rainbow crystal Life Sword and used it to purify the gaseous soul instead of destroying it.

When I placed the sword into the motionless body, the cleansed soul followed its light home.

The monster sprang back to life, but the evil driving its attacks was gone.

I carried the enormous creature out of the city with Lucid Light and lowered it into the ocean.

Fed by the sea and guided by its purified heart, the former monster grew into a good-hearted guardian of the coast.

Saving the city
established me as the strongest superhero in the world, and the public began calling me number one.

A crimson-haired flying hero attacked
without warning,
then explained that
she was neither evil
nor an enemy of innocent people.

She had been the greatest hero before my victory, and she needed a direct fight to decide which of us truly deserved the title.

Remembering the robot boxing I had practiced while awake, I transformed
my skin and clothing
into protective metal.

Her blows barely moved my armored body, while every counterpunch landed with the weight of a steel machine.

She ignited her crimson hair and attacked with enough heat to melt my armor, my clothes, and finally my entire body.

I remained conscious as living liquid metal, and the slime monster's transformation showed me how to use this new form.

You've become armor for me.

Yeah—if I give you the freedom to move.

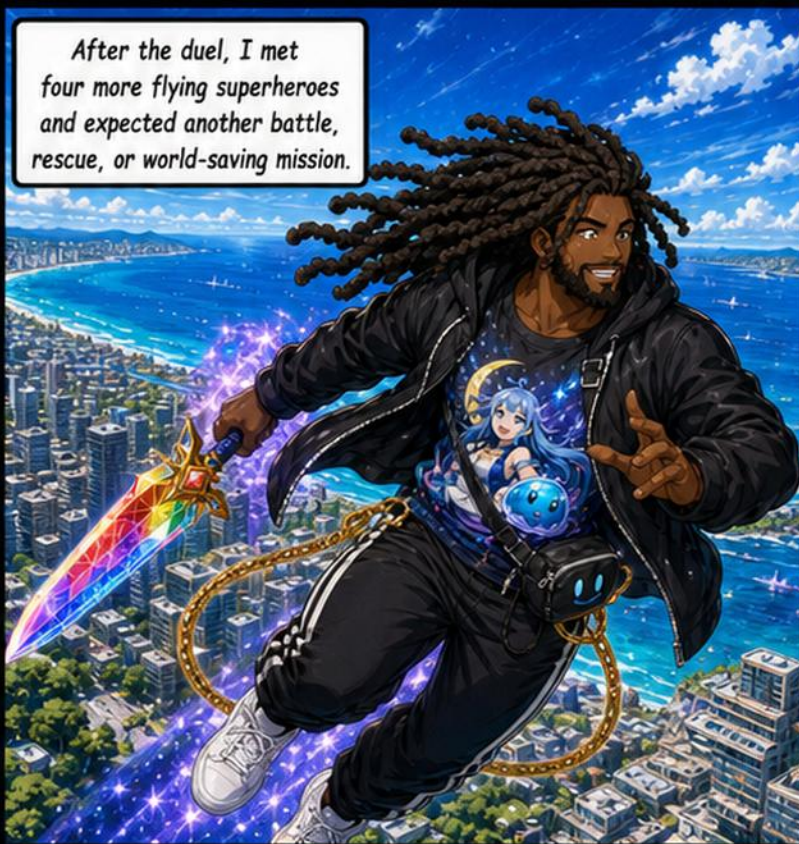

I wrapped around her body, hardened into a prison, and restrained her until she briefly lost consciousness.

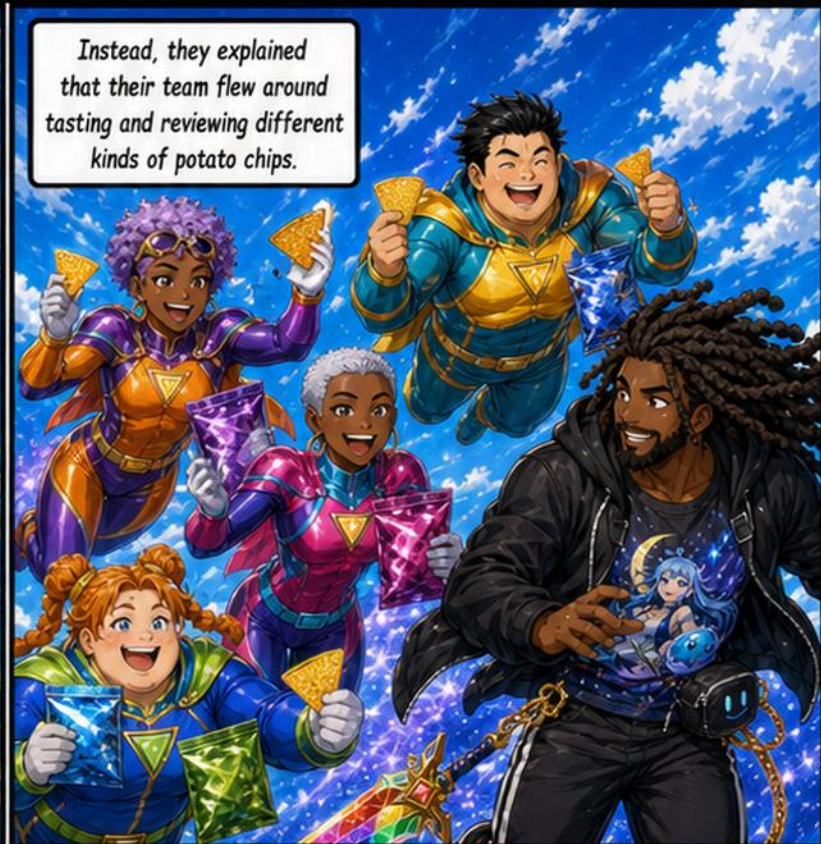

Then I released her unharmed, rebuilt my human form with Lucid Light, and remained the world's number-one hero.

After the duel, I met four more flying superheroes and expected another battle, rescue, or world-saving mission.

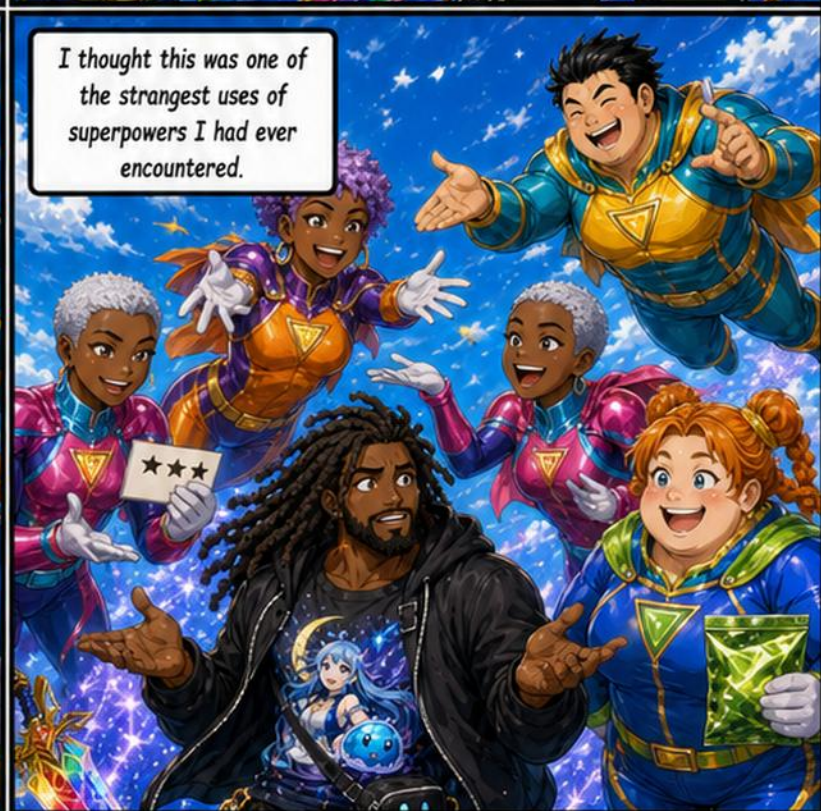

Instead, they explained that their team flew around tasting and reviewing different kinds of potato chips.

They had the power to cross the sky, yet devoted their days to comparing crunch, seasoning, and flavor.

I thought this was one of the strangest uses of superpowers I had ever encountered.

Then their leader handed me one golden triangular chip and invited me to judge their mission for myself.

The chip had the shape and crunch of a tortilla chip, with enough salt to make every edge sparkle.

Sweet honey arrived next, followed by a small peppery kick that made the flavor even brighter.

It reminded me of honey-roasted peanut butter, although this was saltier, crunchier, and slightly spicier.

After one bite, I understood exactly why these superheroes had made potato chips their great adventure.

I spent the rest of the dream flying with them, sharing the best chips I had ever tasted above an ocean guarded by the hero I had saved.
