

THE PERFECT EMPTY DIMENSION

AUGUST 16, 2026

Flying above the city,
I noticed a giant green
slime monster—but it was not harming anyone.

When it smashed the road merely to get my attention, I called the threat performative.

Then it raised one tentacle and revealed
a woman trapped inside.

I had misjudged the danger. Now I had to save her without killing the creature.

I drew Silonis, the Rainbow Crystal Sword of Life, and joined their life energies.

The hostage and her captor became one towering slime woman—safe from attack, but horrified by the fusion.

Neither wanted to remain trapped in a body that denied who they were.

I promised the transformation was temporary. Rescue without consent was not a solution.

With one careful cut of Silonis, I separated their lives and restored them both.

Then Porta opened a path to the Empty Dimension, where the slime monster could cause no immediate harm.

The woman asked whether I had sent it to the Glimmer, a spirit-prison for magical enemies.

No. The Empty Dimension was simply a place to be alone with its own thoughts.

The more I described that solitude, the less it sounded like punishment.

I loved being alone long enough to narrate my life, think freely, and hear myself clearly.

So I opened Porta again—and stepped into the Empty Dimension myself.

On the other side, I split into two: one self to live there, and one self to watch.

The resident me lived among familiar people in a world that felt softly digital.

I ate once a day. I slept on the floor. I followed every unusual routine that felt natural.

No one judged me, questioned me, or demanded an explanation.

This was not the freedom to be a superhero. It was the freedom to be myself.

After what felt like a long time, observer-me remembered the waking world.

7:58 AM

It was almost eight in the morning. I knew I should get up.

Resident-me answered like a siren: This world is perfect.
We can stay and never worry again.

The offer was genuine. Nothing here was secretly cruel—and that made it harder to refuse.

But acceptance without responsibility was not the whole life I wanted.

I still had people, promises, and work waiting beyond the dream.

I told my other self, "I'm good. I have things I need to do."

Then I let the perfect dimension fade—and chose to wake up.
