

THE SWORD REMEMBERS

AUGUST 11, 2026

*I found myself inside
a library so vast that its shelves seemed to continue forever.*

*A knight carried and
shelved books, while a
pale-blue-haired woman
relaxed behind the
front desk.*

*She told me she was
reading her life book—
one volume among
countless books
describing every person's life.*

*The past became fixed
only after it happened.
The future kept
rewriting itself as an
uncertain estimate.*

*I found the idea
deeply fascinating.*

The librarian cared
for the enormous
archive almost alone.

By day, she rested
her magic but worked
with her body.

By night, she rested
her body but spent
her magic animating
the armor.

She could only
ever half rest.

I wanted to free her
from that burden, so
I used Silonis to make
the armor genuinely
alive.

The moment the armor became alive, it went ballistic.

It dropped the books it had carried for so long and raced straight toward the librarian.

I acted before anger could become tragedy.

Silvius formed a sealed rainbow-crystal shield around the knight.

With the attack contained, I demanded the truth.

The knight revealed that the librarian had animated it as a servant.

When it eventually asked for freedom, she answered with a spell that suppressed its will.

Siloina had restored the freedom she buried—and all the knight's anger with it.

Then the librarian acted my sword as if greeting someone she had known before.

She called Siloina by name and cried, "Oh, baby, you've returned."

The librarian clutched Silonis and spoke of
memories the sword
did not share.

Silonis rejected her.

It tore free from her
grasp and flew back
to me.

She chased after it,
unable to accept that
the sword had chosen.

I pierced her with the Sword of Life—not to
injure her, but to heal
and purify whatever
had corrupted her.

For one moment,
the darkness left her.

Then it crawled back.

Her eyes turned red
as the same presence
spoke through another
stolen face.

It had been jumping
from person to person,
always seeking the Rainbow Crystal Sword.

Every host, every obsession,
every attempt to separate Silonis from me had belonged to the same darkness.

I had mistaken
the pursuit for
ordinary greed,
fame, or hunger
for power.

Now I understood:
one darkness had been
moving through many
hosts to reach Silonis.

I would not leave
the Sword of Life
with the corrupted
librarian.

I took flight, passed through the library's immense glass window, and returned to the Storyverse.

The darkness remembered the sword. It still did not understand me.