Paint Puddle Identity

Sleep paralysis
opened the lucid gate.

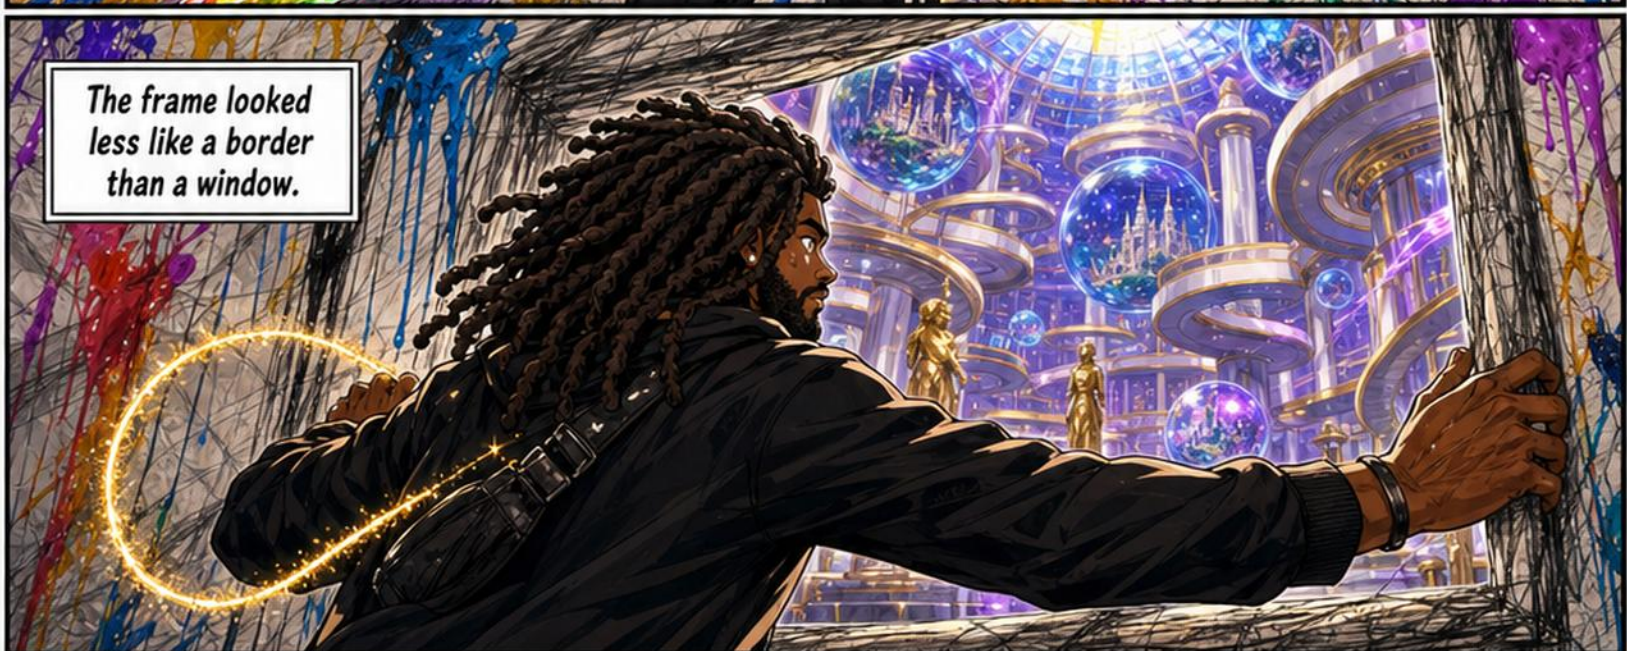

I woke inside
a crinkled sketch.

Paint splattered
every paper wall.

The frame looked
less like a border
than a window.

*I climbed out into
a museum of white,
purple, and gold.*

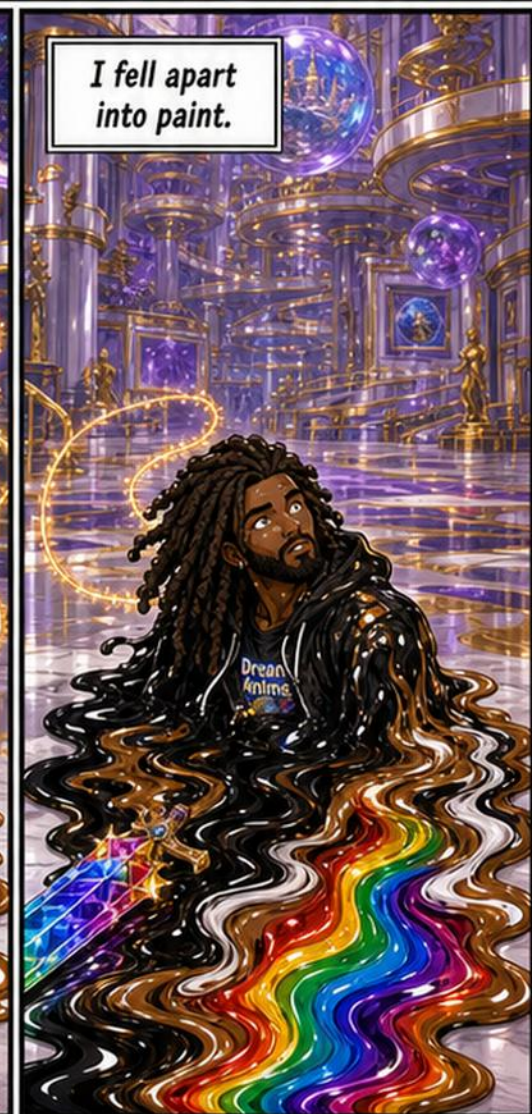

*The hallways coiled
like spinning thoughts.*

*Then the dream
changed my body.*

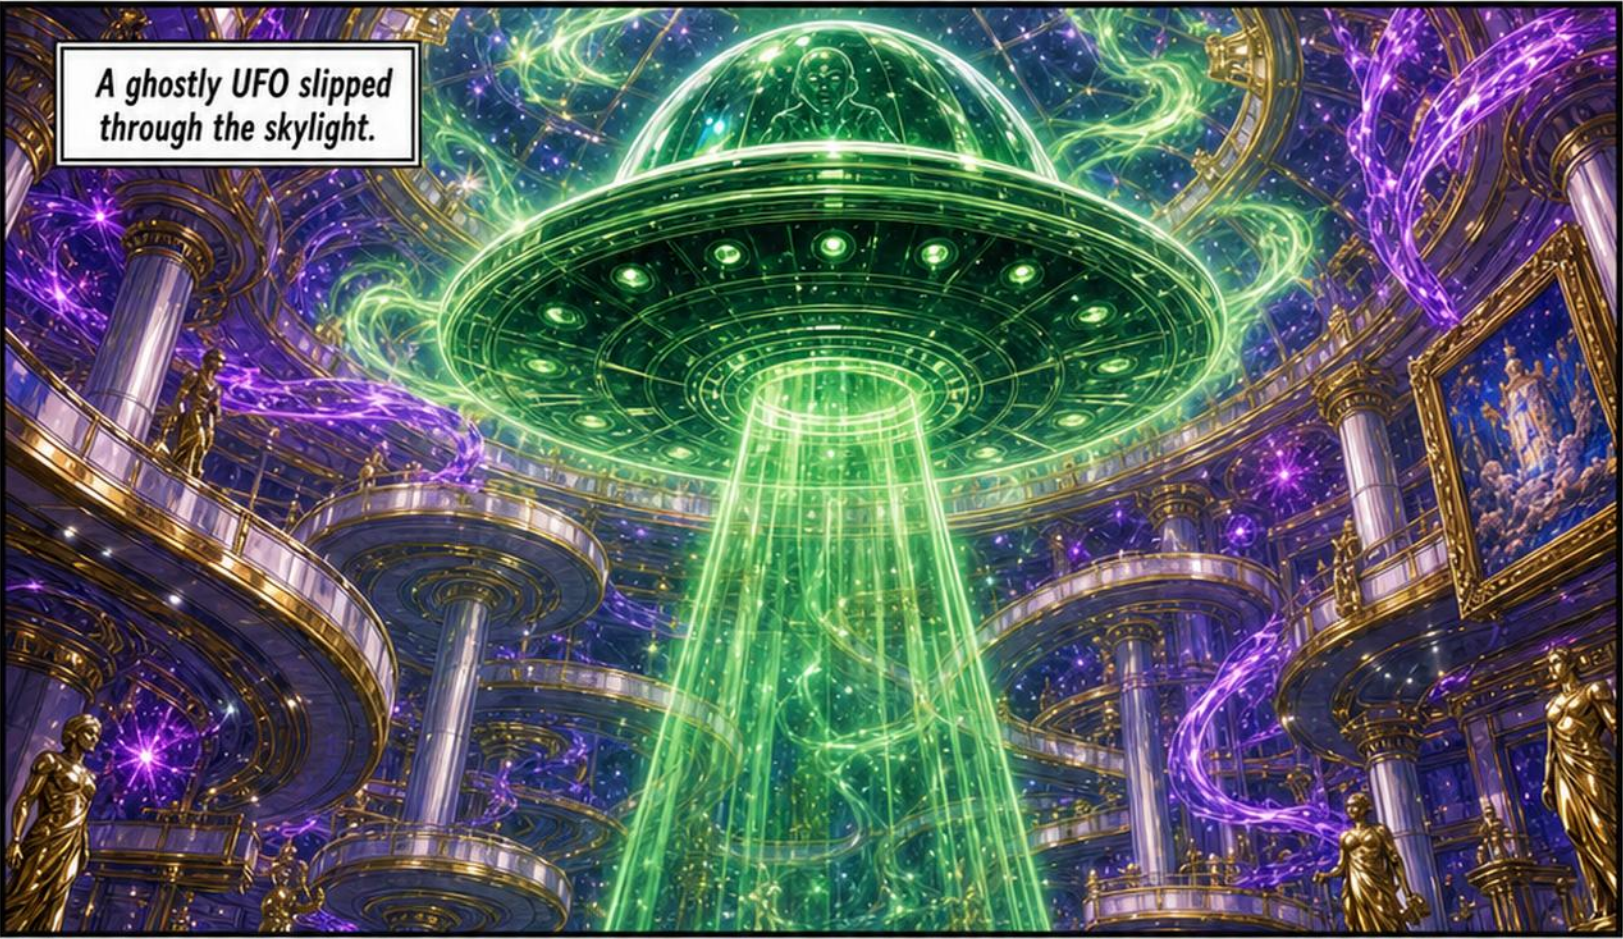

*I fell apart
into paint.*

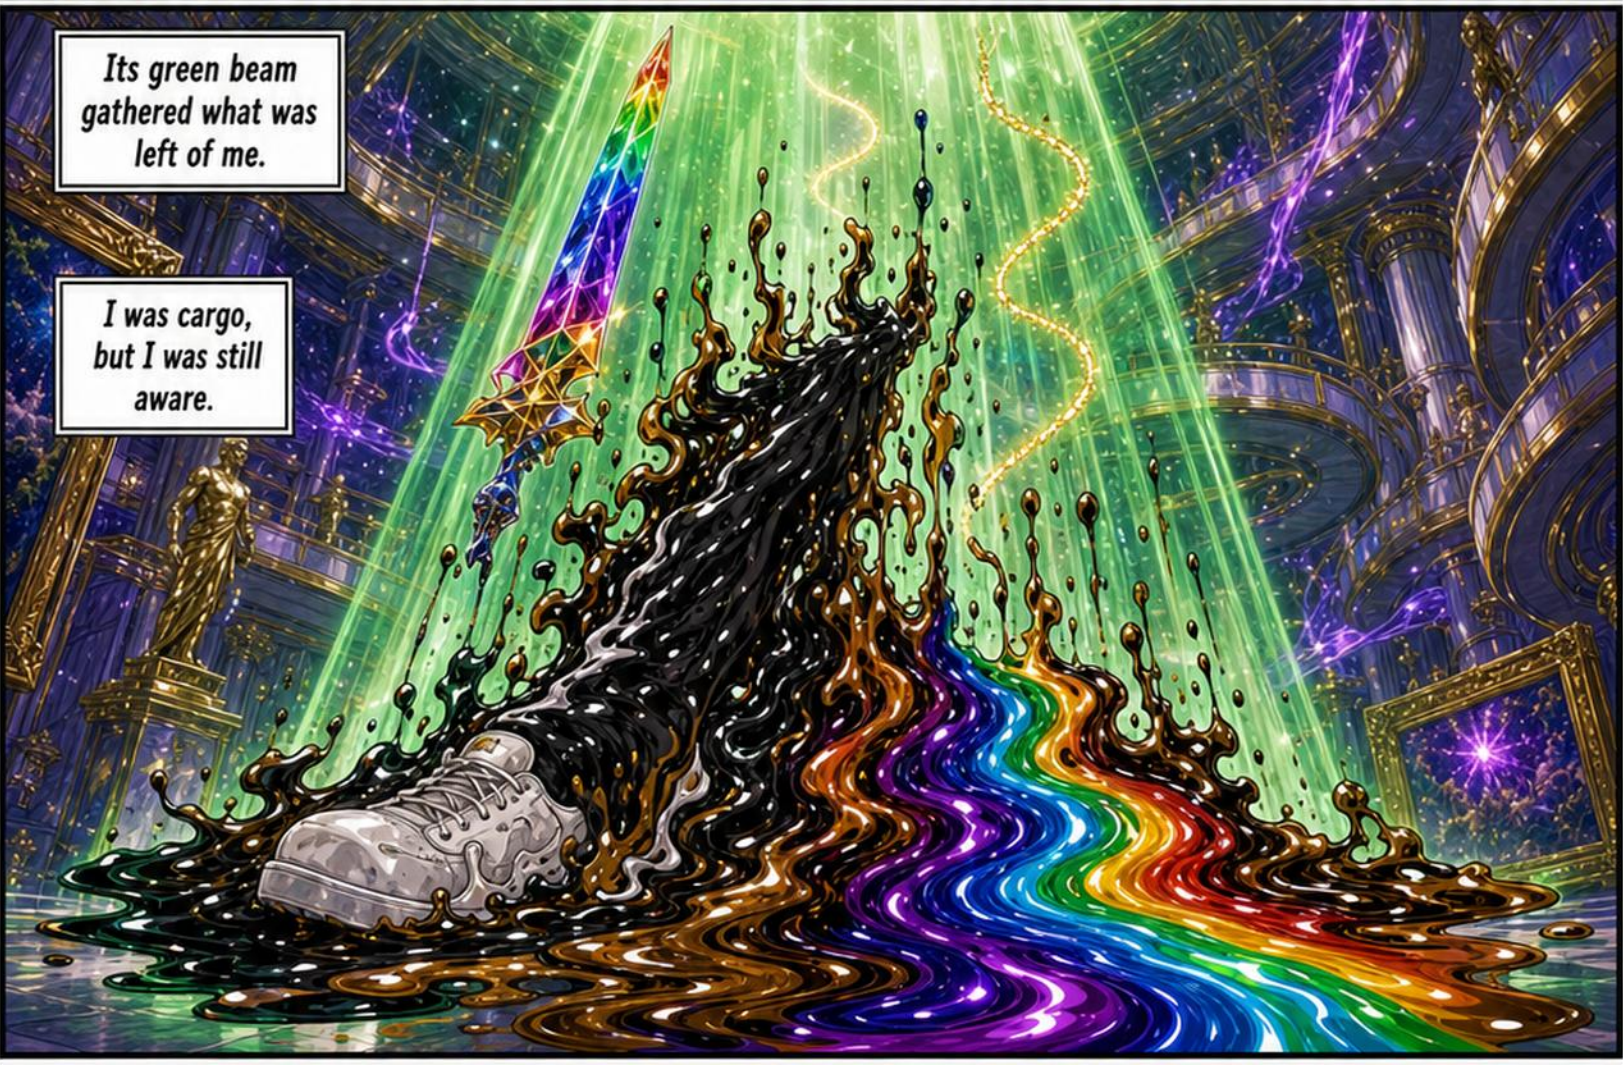

The museum
opened to the sky.

A ghostly UFO slipped
through the skylight.

Its green beam
gathered what was
left of me.

I was cargo,
but I was still
aware.

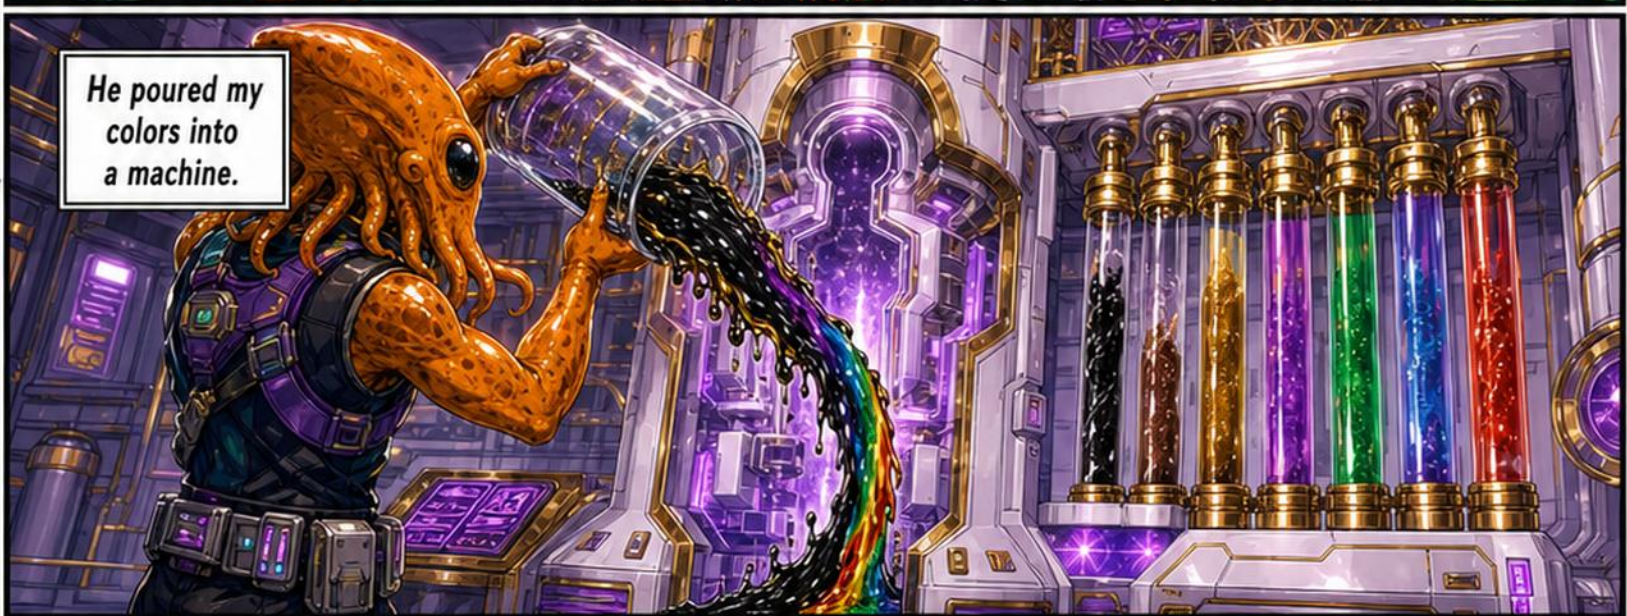

The pilot was
a humanoid
orange squid.

He collected me
like rare pigment.

He poured my colors into
a machine.

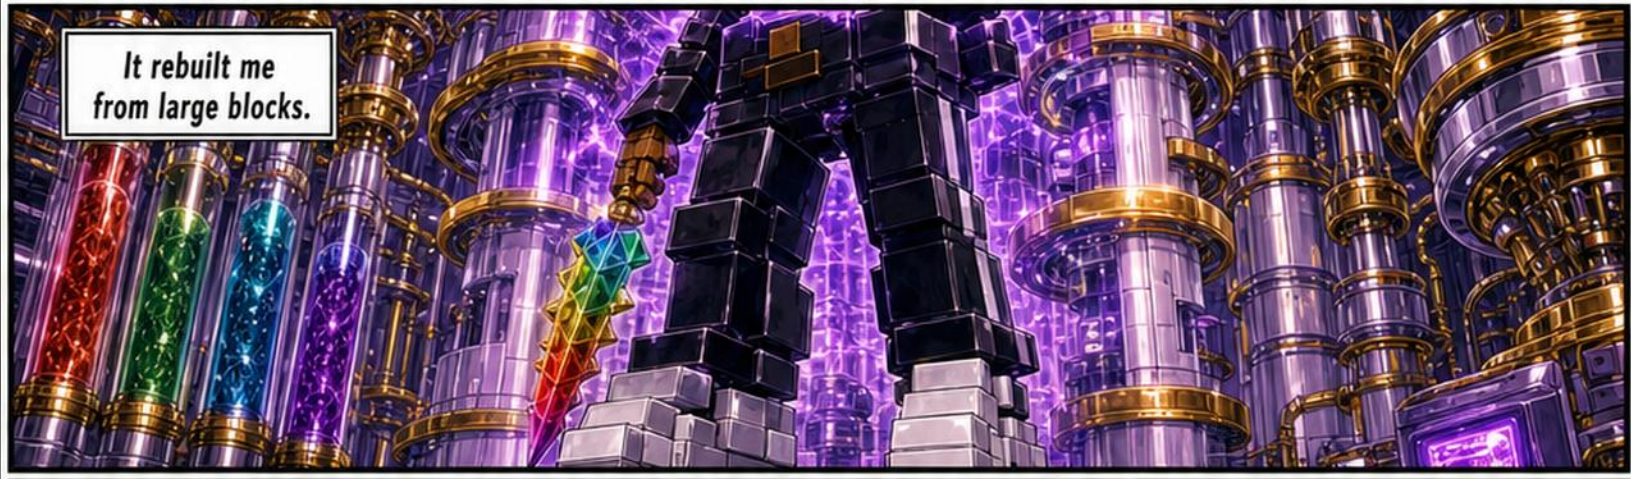

The machine
believed a body
could be solved.

The machine
pressed me
into shape.

It rebuilt me
from large blocks.

The result
stood upright.

But it did not
feel like me.

Rigid was not
the same as real.

Lucidity
returned as a choice.

I stopped
accepting the form I was handed.

I softened
the blocks
into clay.

Clay could become what
I meant.

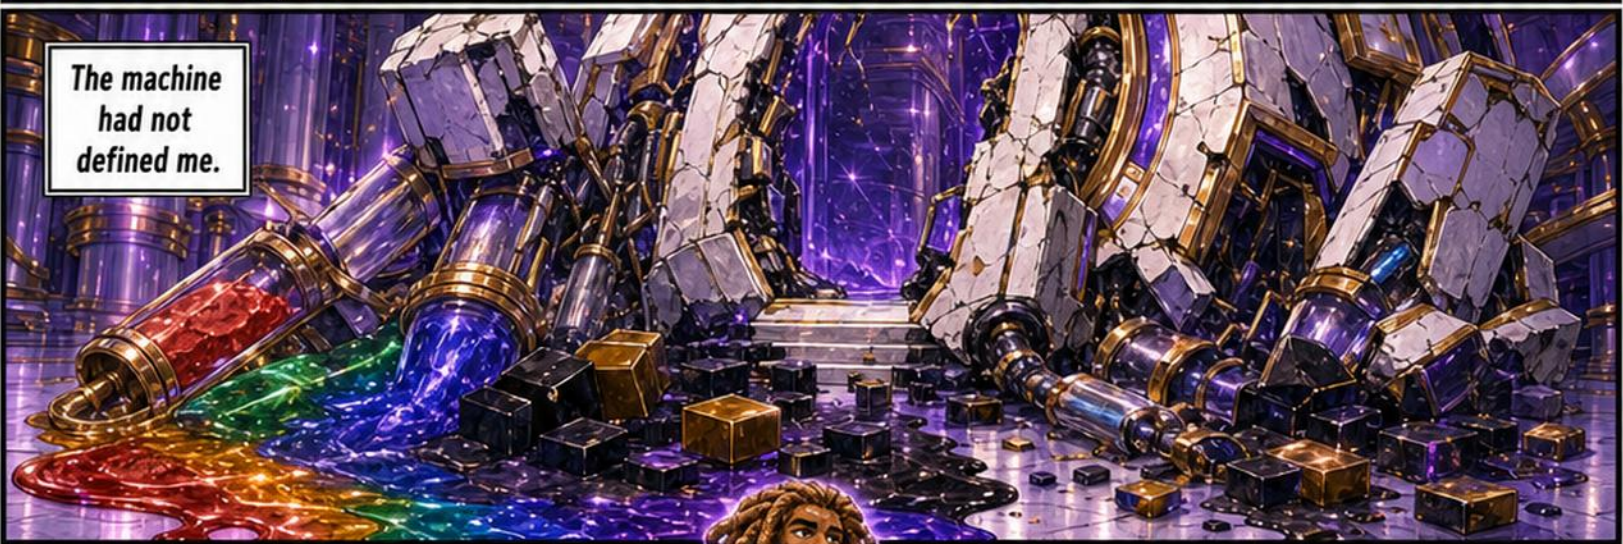

The museum
slowed
around me.

The sketch
had not defined me.

The machine
had not defined me.

I would decide what
I became.
