BLUD SHAKE VAMPIRES

Sleep paralysis made me lucid, and the Storyverse opened into a vampire castle cellar.

In this version of the dream, I was Vampire Jet, still myself but stronger, faster, and armed with fangs.

Vampire Johnson was with me, red-skinned and wearing a black astronaut suit.

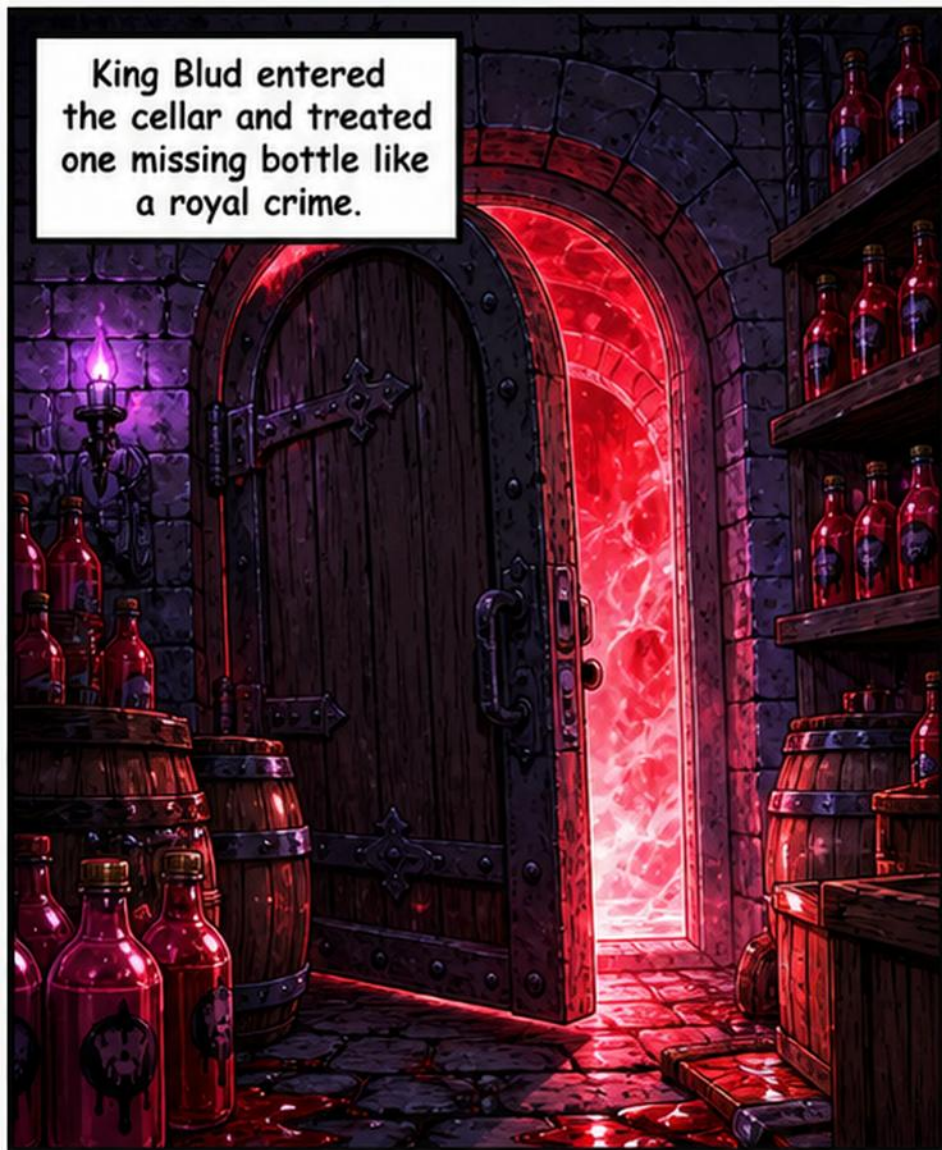

The shelves were packed with Blud Shakes, a blood substitute that let vampires feed without drinking people.

I took one bottle because one Blud Shake a day seemed fair.

King Blud entered the cellar and treated one missing bottle like a royal crime.

He was a living vessel of Blud Shake, huge, transparent, and furious.

He ordered me to stop stealing from his hoard.

I told him I only needed one a day, and if he refused to share, I would drink him instead.

King Blut answered with his axe.

The blade came down hard enough to split the cellar stones.

I caught it between two fingers.

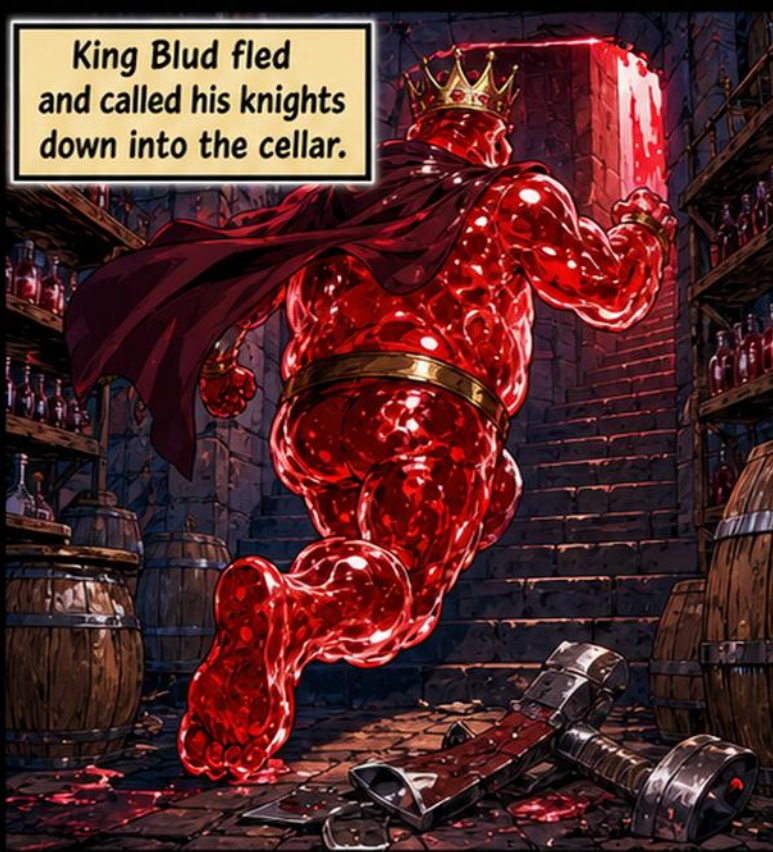

I warned him that vampires were far too strong and fast for this fight.

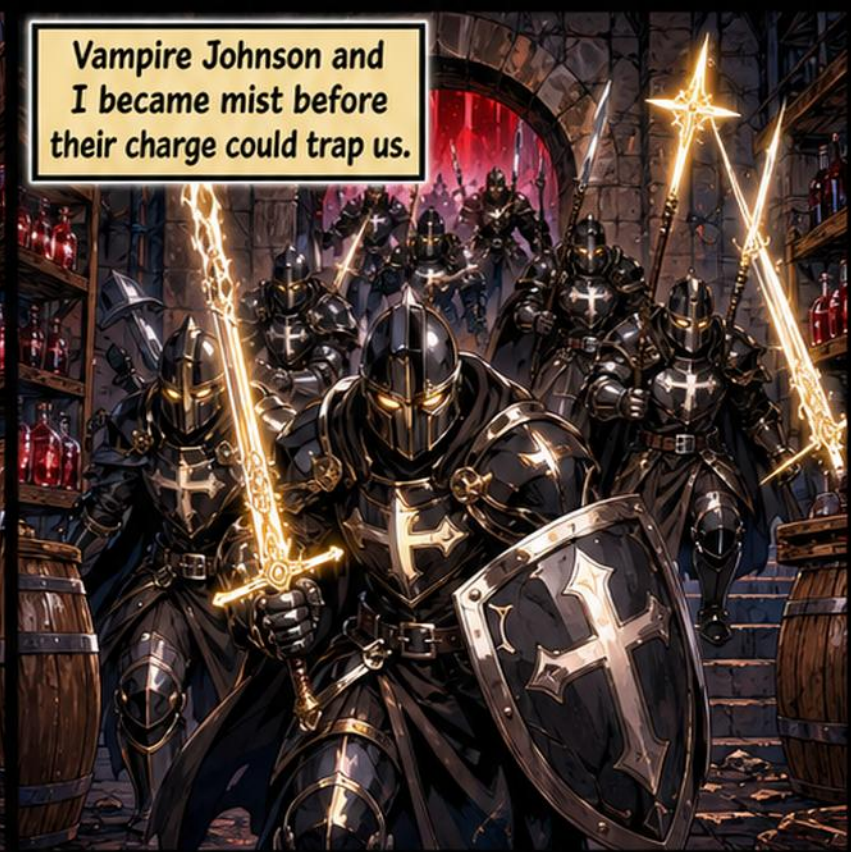

Then I twisted the weapon away, grabbed the handle, and snapped the axe in half.

King Blud fled and called his knights down into the cellar.

Vampire Johnson and I became mist before their charge could trap us.

The knights carried holy weapons that could cut even vapor.

Each strike carved little pieces from our mist bodies.

The loose chunks drifted together
instead of vanishing.

They reformed into something tiny, fast, and feral.

The tiny fusion moved faster than the knights could follow.

It tore through the holy weapons and scattered the armored guards.

For a moment, the cellar belonged to us.

Then I realized the fusion might drink every Blud Shake in the room.

Vampire Johnson and I escaped through the cellar grate as mist and called the fusion after us.

Outside the castle, the fusion rose from the grate and rejoined us.

The final knight appeared alone, furious over every fallen guard.

Dawn was breaking, and the sunlight burned all three of us.

He was the strongest knight, and we could not win while the sun was on our skin.

I bit him and turned the last threat into one of us.

I gave the only order that could save us: become wolves and dig.

Together we clawed holes into the dirt while sunrise spread over the castle.

At the last possible moment, we became bats.

We flew down into the holes, where the sunlight could not reach us.

We all survived to feast for another day.
