

07/06/2026:

MOON PIZZA MITES

Sleep paralysis made me lucid, and the Storyverse dropped me onto the moon alone.

Earth hung above the gray horizon while a warm pizzeria glowed in the distance.

Inside, the restaurant sold pizzas made from flattened moons.

Every slice looked like a tiny cratered moon folded into food.

I ordered one because I wanted to know what moon pizza tasted like.

The first bite was dry, chalky, and much stranger than any normal pizza.

Before I could complain, tiny creatures started crawling over my body.

The crawling turned into burning as I tried to brush them away.

A purple slime woman doctor hurried over and explained the problem.

She told me the creatures were moon mites, and fighting them made them hurt more.

I stopped fighting the moon mites and gave them permission to stay.

The burning faded as the swarm realized I was not trying to drive it away.

The insects locked together into armor over my body.

The moon-mite exoskeleton made me stronger, tougher, and still clearly myself.

That was useful, but the restaurant had not warned me at all.

I asked why the menu did not warn people about the moon mites.

The doctor said the restaurant assumed nobody would order the pizza if they did not already know.

At another table, a woman bit into her own chalky moon slice.

Moon mites crawled over her too, but she panicked and resisted them.

The burning became flames before anyone could stop it.

A customer had become a pile of ash just for trying to eat pizza on the moon.

I was annoyed enough to ask for the manager.

The manager was a towering mammoth chef with tusks, a huge hat, and no patience for criticism.

He did not want to hear about disclaimers, dead customers, or basic menu honesty.

Instead, he went into battle mode and swung a giant pizza peel at my head.

The moon-mite armor absorbed the strike and made the fight very unfair for him.

I punched
the manager through
the ceiling and
followed him into
open space.

He crashed onto the
lunar surface, but
I leaped after him
before he could
recover.

The moon-mite armor
carried every hit with
more strength than
I expected.

I punched him across
the moon, past craters
and startled pizzeria
signs.

Then I concentrated
the entire swarm into
one giant armored fist.

The final punch
drove the mammoth
chef into a massive
crater.

I told him to add
a clear disclaimer
to the menu.

This time the
mammoth chef
listened because he
respected a warrior
who could beat him
in combat.

The new warning made
the rule obvious: accept
the moon mites or do not
order the pizza.

No one else should
burn to ash just to enjoy a slice on
the moon.

Personally, I would not recommend moon pizza
unless you want cool
powers and do not mind
the chalky taste.

