

THE DEVICE BEYOND TIME

AUGUST 18, 2026

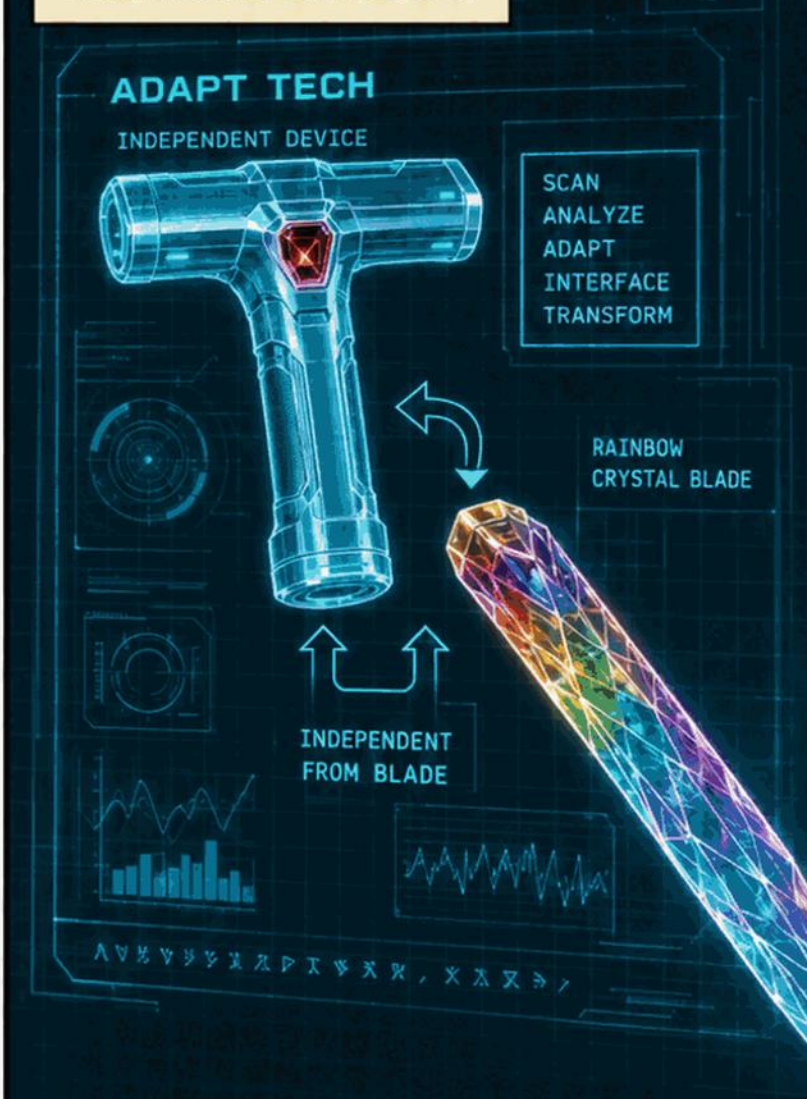

This dream began in my magical study, where I questioned why crystal-sword hilts were always called future technology.

The T-shaped handle had a red scanner and could function as a complete device on its own.

It was called Adapt Tech: technology designed to learn from whatever surrounded it.

If it could become almost any machine, perhaps this 'sword hilt' had never been made only for swords.

Adapt Tech could scan an ordinary machine, explain it, and copy its functionality.

One device could learn from a laptop, a router, or nearly any technology nearby.

It could also assimilate into existing objects—even magical crystals—and adapt both systems to work together.

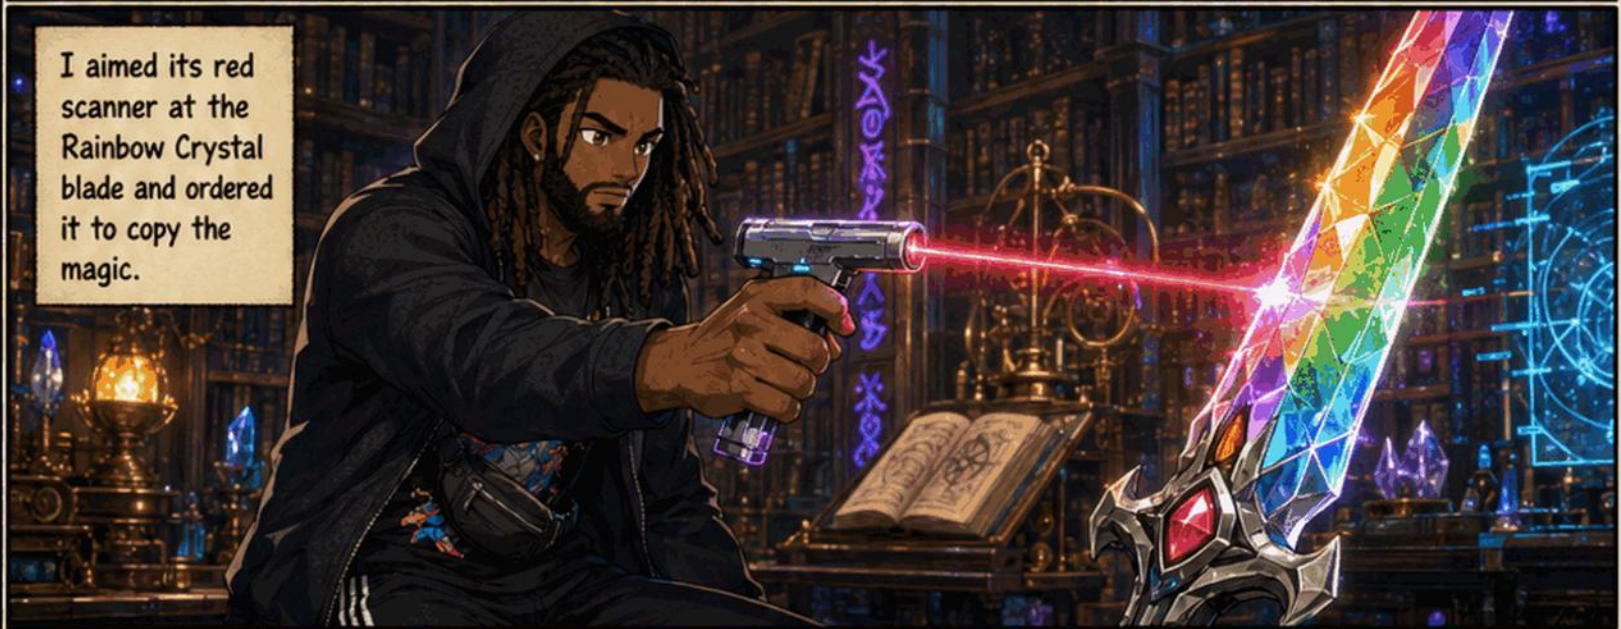

That raised one dangerous question: if it could copy any function, why did Silonis still need a physical Rainbow Crystal blade?

Using Lucid Light, I created a second Adapt Tech device identical to Silonis's hilt, but without a crystal.

I aimed its red scanner at the Rainbow Crystal blade and ordered it to copy the magic.

The device did not learn the crystal's power.

Instead, the failed scan broke the boundary between the machine and me.

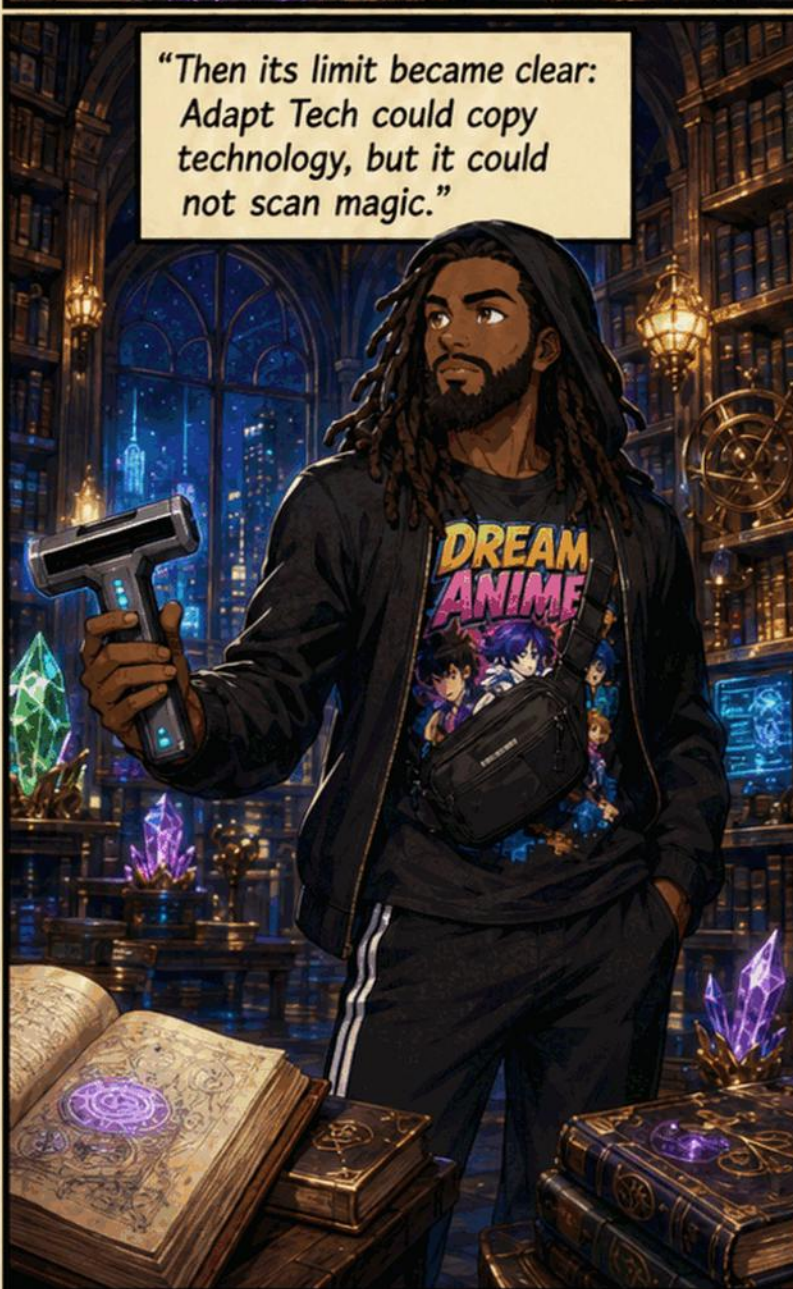

"Blue, brown, and green crystal-like blocks consumed the device and spread across my body."

"I forced Adapt Tech to shut down, and the corruption released me."

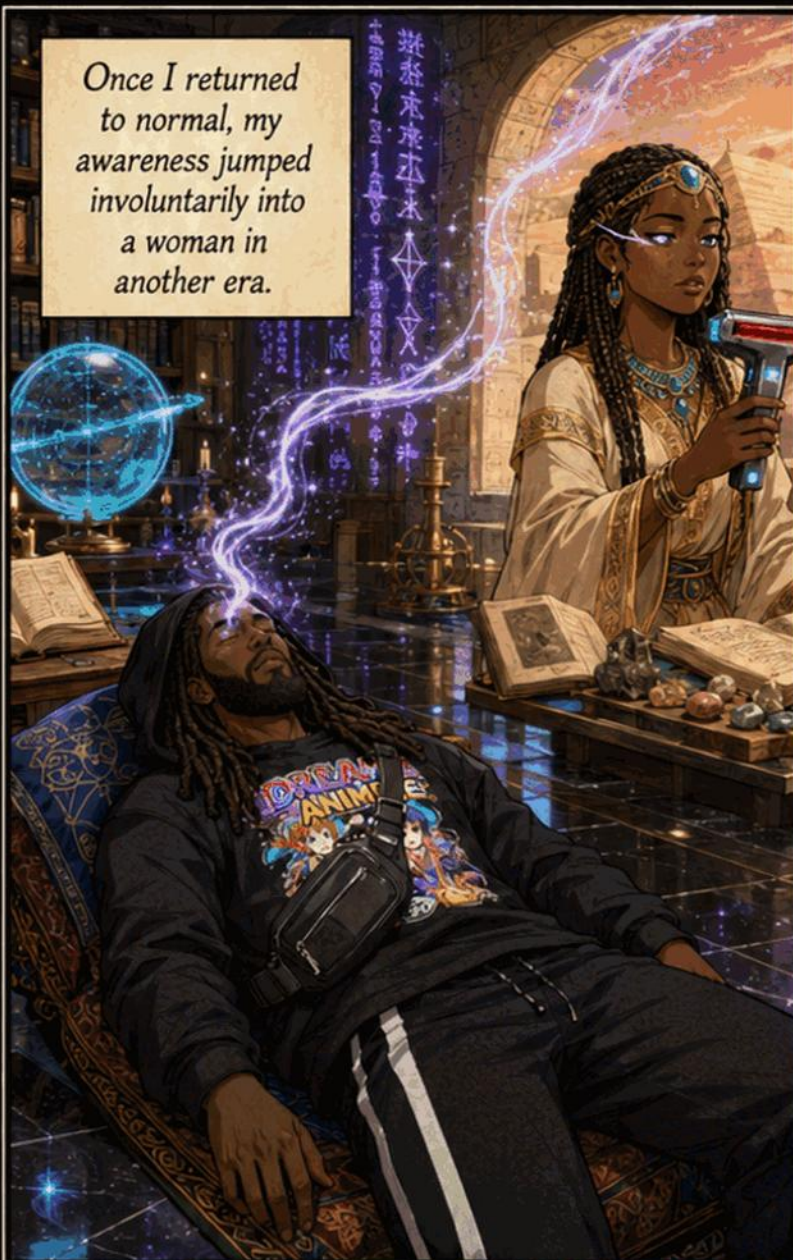

"Then its limit became clear: Adapt Tech could copy technology, but it could not scan magic."

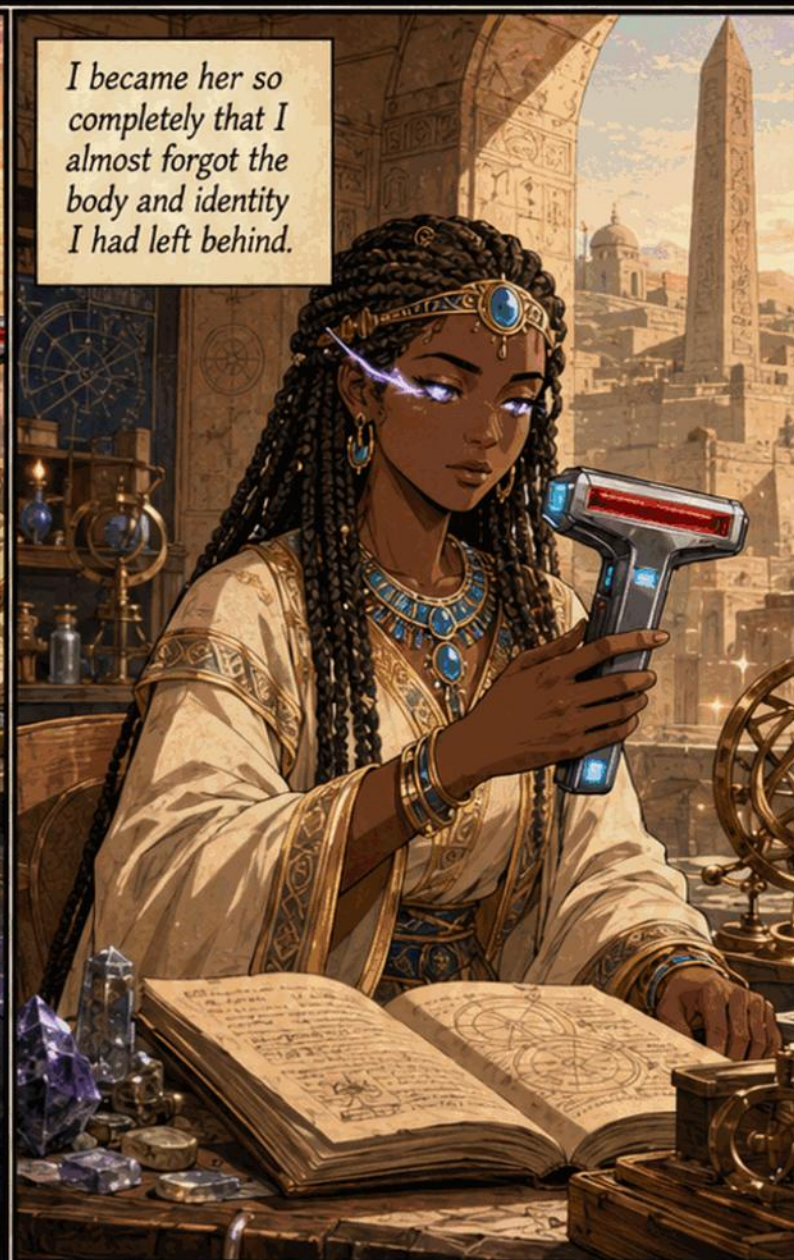

"Magic had to be joined through assimilation. That partnership was what made crystal swords unique."

Once I returned to normal, my awareness jumped involuntarily into a woman in another era.

I became her so completely that I almost forgot the body and identity
I had left behind.

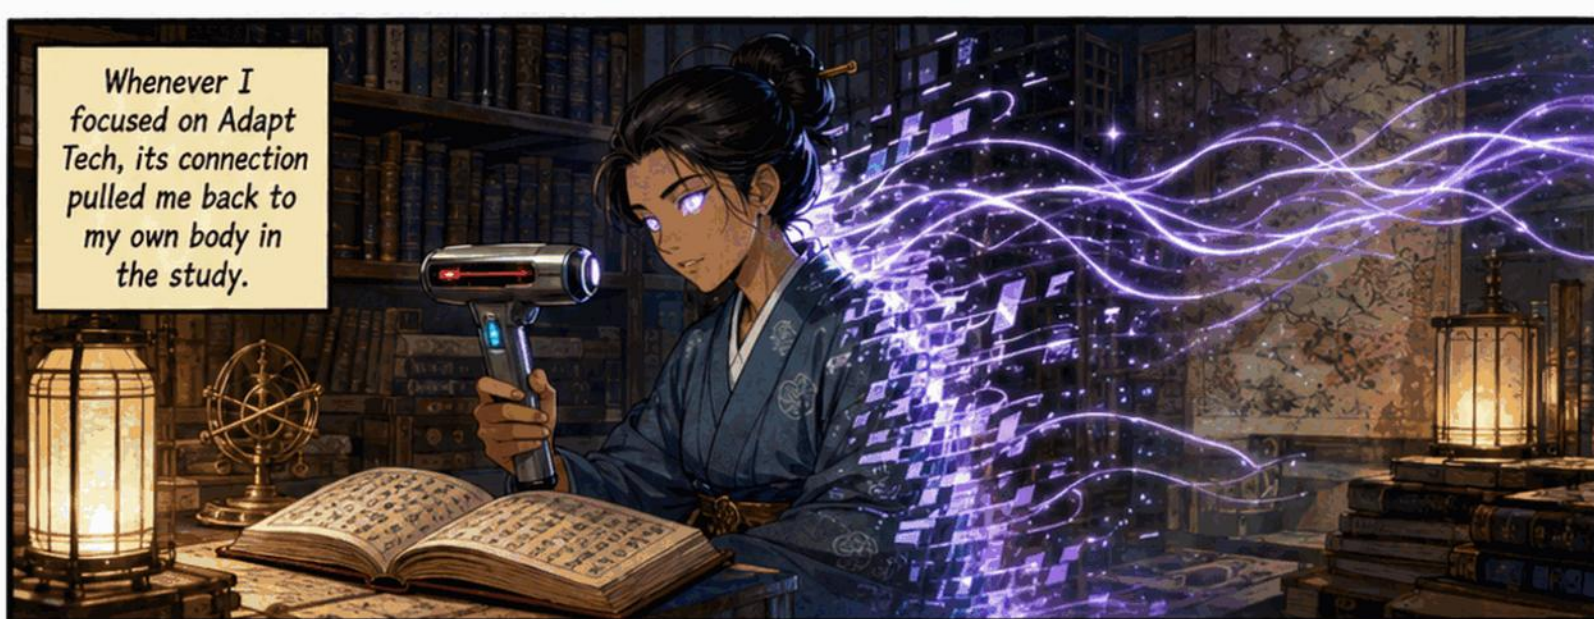

The next hop
carried me into another woman,
and then another.

Every life was investigating, using,
or being hunted for
the same impossible
future technology.

Whenever I
focused on Adapt Tech, its connection pulled me back to my own body in the study.

Then it hurled me
into another user
somewhere else
in history.

I was not choosing
these journeys.
The technology
seemed to connect everyone who touched—or even contemplated—it.

Maybe Adapt Tech
was scattered through history because adapting meant escaping the boundaries of time.

The answer echoed what I had learned about Portal Crystals: connection could bridge not only places, but thoughts.

Adapt Tech might never have been sent into the past. Every instance could belong to one system spread loosely across the timeline.

It could copy machines, join with magic, and link identities across eras—but each power still obeyed a hidden rule.

Rule Recursion can be used.
• Magic can be assimilated.
• Identities can be connected.
• All powers obey a hidden rule.

I ended the dream with more understanding, and a deeper mystery: who created a device that existed beyond when?

