

DANDELION GOLDEN SHOWDOWN

Dream

JULY 16, 2026

I induced lucidity through sleep paralysis and arrived alone in a city within the Storyverse.

I cast my golden energy tether toward a skyscraper and swung out above the streets.

Gravity and momentum did not control the arc. My Lucid Light held me safely in the air whenever the tether went slack.

I could float, push myself forward, and begin another swing from any position I chose.

With Lucid Light removing the danger of falling, I could perform as many flips as I wanted without a care in the world.

Then a purple villain covered in spikes saw the rainbow crystal sword at my side.

The Sword of Life was the only prize they wanted, and their freakishly long claws reached for it.

My joyful flight became a fight before I ever touched the street.

The villain drove every claw into the street, but the attack did not stay beneath their own hands.

The claws traveled underground, rose beneath me, and stabbed through my shoes to hold both feet in place.

I used the Sword of Life to cut through the restraints before the villain could take the blade from me.

When I stepped free, I quietly collected several pieces of the shattered claws.

The villain mocked me: "My claws will keep coming. I can do this all day."

I showed them the broken pieces and answered: "You should never have let me get hold of your claw fragments."

Lucid Light wrapped the sharp purple shards in a tiny night sky.

I changed every piece of the villain's weapon into a living dandelion.

I raised the dandelions and blew their seeds toward the villain.

The drifting seeds looked soft, but each one carried a clear command shaped by Lucid Light.

Wherever a seed landed, roots and stems joined together into a small dandelion golem.

Within moments, an entire living squad had formed around the villain.

The villain struck the first golem, expecting one slash to destroy it.

Instead, the scattered seeds formed two complete golems where one had stood.

Every new hit divided more of them, so every act of aggression doubled the problem.

The villain kept attacking until the intersection became a moving field of dandelions.

Soon there were too many golems to fight, escape, or even count.

At last the villain stopped attacking, raised both hands, and surrendered to the army their own blows had multiplied.

I let the golems become a peaceful field of dandelions and ended the fight without taking the villain's life.

The trick was inspired by the Monkey King, who could blow pieces of his hair into many helpers.

I swung back into the sky, delighted that lucidity had let me combine flight, swinging, and one wonderfully strange idea.
