

THE METAL RABBIT'S RODEO REDEMPTION

JULY 31, 2026

I induced lucidity through sleep paralysis and immediately entered an empty, dark void.

There I met a grimy skeletal rabbit made of orange metal, with glowing red eyes and two enormous buck teeth.

Its design fascinated me far more than it frightened me.

The rabbit approached and asked whether I was afraid of it. I told it that I was not.

I knew that I was lucid and in control, while its entire goal was simply to scare me.

It raised its arms and filled the darkness with purple fog, hiding whatever might exist beyond my sight.

When the fog failed,
the rabbit summoned
decayed skeletal
clowns from beneath
the ground.

I had never found clowns especially frightening, so the
rabbit armed them
with chainsaws
pulled from their own rib cages.

I summoned
Silonis, my living
rainbow crystal
Sword of Life.

Instead of retreating,
I let the clowns strike
me so the rabbit could see that physical
attacks were useless.

Every injury vanished
beneath the rainbow
life energy radiating
from Silonis.

The rabbit's
nightmare creatures
could hurt me for an instant, but the Sword of Life would always make me
whole.

The rabbit changed tactics and summoned a black, many-armed spider that swung past me at tremendous speed.

One adhesive palm caught Silonis and held the sword fast while the rabbit cackled and the clowns closed in.

Stealing Silonis did not make me helpless. The Sword of Life possessed a living will and could fly without me.

When the spider could not release it, Silonis twisted through the air and sliced away the trapped hand.

The sword returned to my grasp, carrying the harmless black hand still stuck to its blade.

I sealed myself inside a nearly indestructible dome of rainbow crystal so nothing else could reach me.

The rabbit noticed the one weakness in my dome: the barrier did not extend beneath my feet.

A puppy-sized mole man erupted inside it, followed by another, and then nearly one hundred more.

They were weak alone, but together they covered my body and threatened to crush me beneath their weight.

For the first time, one of the rabbit's attacks genuinely surprised me.

I dismissed the dome, carried the swarm high into the air, and released a powerful shock wave of Lucid Light.

Sparkling purple force scattered every summoned creature, yet the Metal Rabbit still stood laughing in the void.

The rabbit's red eyes
blazed brighter as it
declared that nothing
I did would ever let me escape.

Its grimy orange-metal
body expanded until
the creature towered
over me as a giant.

I looked up at it
and answered,
"I don't need to escape."

Instead of attacking,
I fired my Lucid Light
into the distance and used it to create something entirely new.

A gigantic metal
carrot rose from
the darkness, shining
like an impossible
gift.

The giant rabbit's entire disposition changed the moment it saw the metal carrot.

Its menace vanished. It rushed to the gift and asked with astonished gratitude, "Is this for me?"

I told it that the carrot was truly meant for it.

The rabbit could not understand my kindness after spending the entire encounter trying to scare me.

I admitted that frightening people was not working and suggested a better path: become a rodeo cowboy.

Beneath the grime, metal bones, and red eyes, I sensed a strange southern charm—and the rabbit suddenly looked hopeful.

The rabbit asked whether I truly believed it had what it took to become a rodeo cowboy.

I told it that I did. Its strange southern charm suited that future far better than a life spent manufacturing fear.

When it was time to part, both of us naturally slipped into slight southern accents.

We exchanged a cheerful "Howdy," and the rabbit finally allowed me to leave.

The dark void became less oppressive as I flew farther away from my former adversary.

I emerged into the bright Storyverse and continued toward its distant bubble universes, leaving a hopeful new cowboy beside his metal carrot.
