

STONE VISION STAMPEDE

JULY 15, 2026

I induced lucidity through sleep paralysis, crossed into the Storyverse, and arrived alone inside a nightclub.

The lights and music still worked, but the dance floor was empty and every seat looked built for someone made of stone.

Carvings of golems and gargoyles covered the walls, while fresh trails of colored slime crossed the floor.

The club was not truly abandoned. Its new occupants were watching me from the darkness.

Eight gorgons flowed from the shadows, each one shaped from a different color of living slime.

They bragged that golems and gargoyles had once filled this nightclub every night.

The gorgons had wrapped their corrosive bodies around the stone patrons and feasted on the rock itself.

Anyone who escaped had abandoned the club, leaving the predators in control of a place that was never meant for them.

"I asked them, "If you turn prey to stone before eating it, why have you not already used stone vision on me?"

They answered that my rainbow crystal sword of life could restore me after one successful blast.

The same blade could also reflect one stone beam directly back at the gorgon who fired it.

That was why no single gorgon wanted to attack first.

Instead, all eight surrounded me and aimed their snake hair from every direction at once.

Their strategy was obvious: they would fire more stone blasts than I could reflect or heal from.

A strike from every side would make the sword's usual defense useless.

They had carefully planned around everything they could see in my hands.

But they had mistaken my visible equipment for the full potential waiting inside my lucid mind.

I used Lucid Light to summon a yellow anti-gravity force-field belt around my waist.

Then I stretched my arms and legs outward, projecting its protection into a complete sphere around me.

Every snake fired at the same instant, filling the nightclub with enough stone vision to petrify me many times over.

The force field stopped every beam before it touched my body.

It did not reflect the attacks, but perfect protection gave me time to create a different counterattack.

I planted my feet against the inside of the shield and started running.

The ball-shaped force field rolled with me, turning my defense into a giant lucid hamster ball.

Their slime could dissolve stone, but it could not corrode a reality-warping barrier before I reached them.

I rolled through every attacker, crushing their shapes into harmless puddles and ending the ambush.

Once the last gorgon stopped moving, I contained them and sent word that the nightclub was safe again.

With the slime gorgons defeated, the golems and gargoyles returned to repair the home they had been forced to abandon.

Stone seats were rebuilt, gargoyle lights shone again, and a golem DJ restarted the music.

The nightclub reopened with its intended clientele filling the dance floor instead of fleeing from predators.

I left the celebration knowing that one lucid idea had protected me and restored an entire community.
