

THE SKY-IRON FROG

AUGUST 7, 2026

I entered a world where colorful fairies lived together among many kinds of magical trees.

Their homes grew from trunks and branches, and every fairy color seemed connected to a different power.

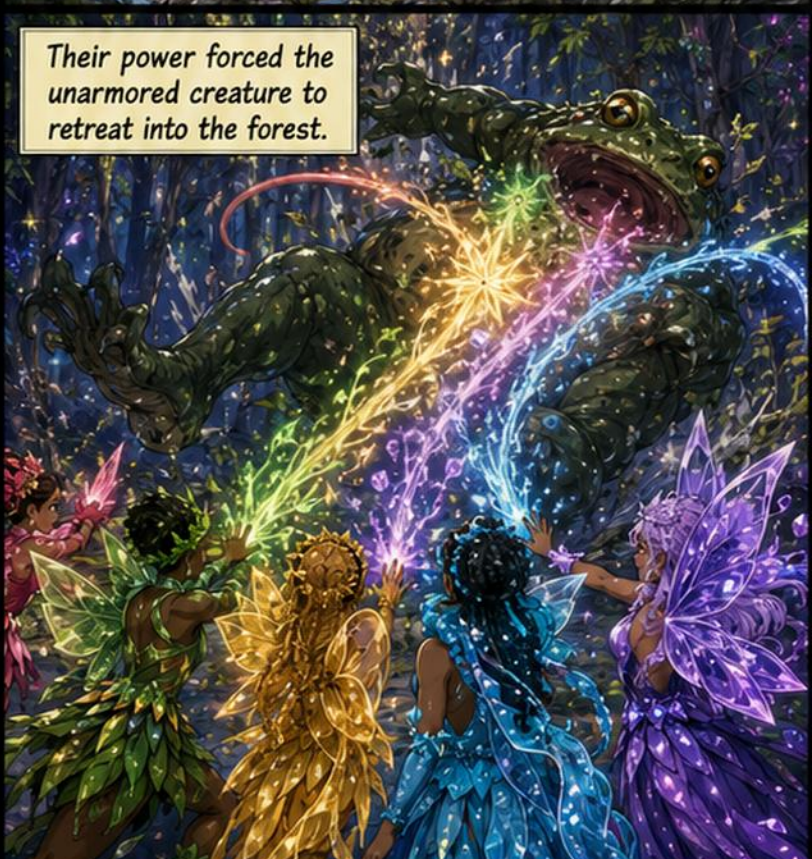

A giant humanoid frog suddenly attacked, snapping its long tongue through the air.

The fairies answered with a brilliant combination of magical spells.

Their power forced the unarmored creature to retreat into the forest.

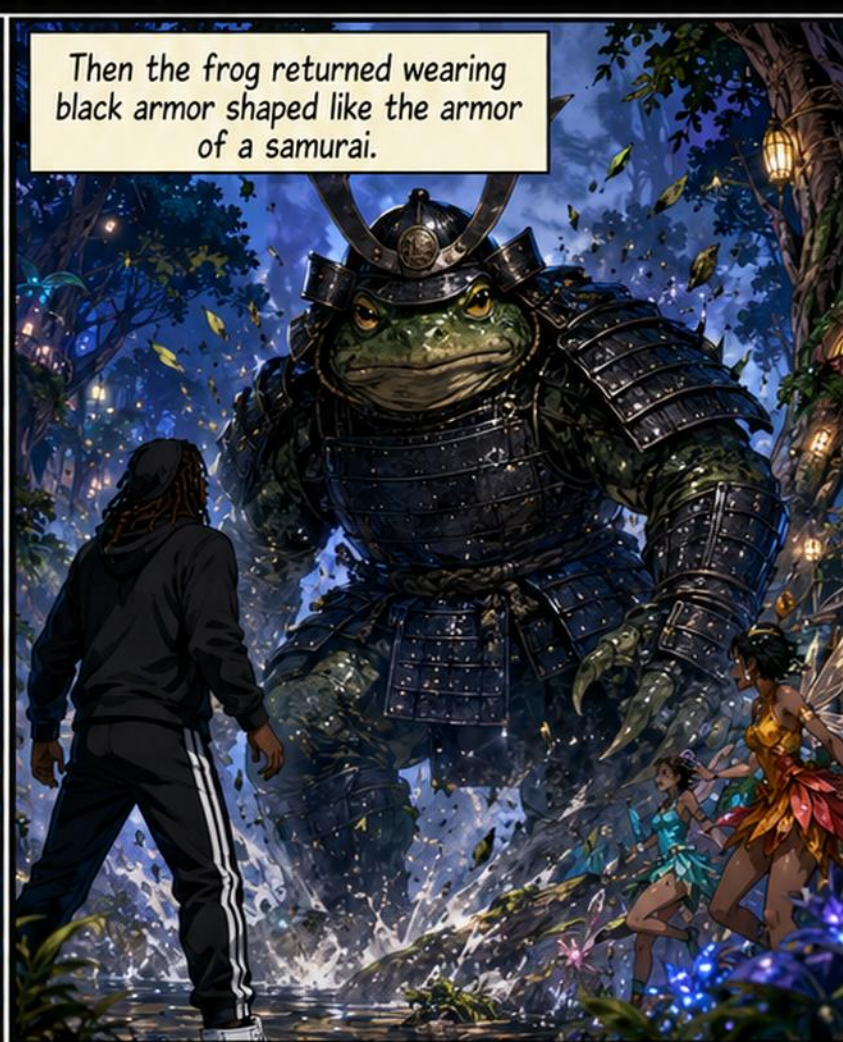

The danger ended so quickly that I did not need to intervene.

After the attack, I explored the treehouses and studied the fairies' different abilities.

Then the frog returned wearing black armor shaped like the armor of a samurai.

The fairies repeated the magical attacks that had defeated it before.

Every glowing spell dissolved harmlessly against the dark plates.

Protected from magic, the frog pushed through the village's defenses.

If we fought the same way again, the village would be doomed.

I remembered legends of meteorite stone whose ore could suppress magic.

If the armor was made from that sky iron, removing it should restore the fairies' advantage.

Geomancy was one of the earliest powers I learned in the Storyverse.

I reached for the mineral ore inside the armor and pulled with all my focus.

The plates moved, but the frog's powerful mucus held them like glue.

I could affect the armor, yet I could not tear it free.

For one terrible moment,
I had no solution left.

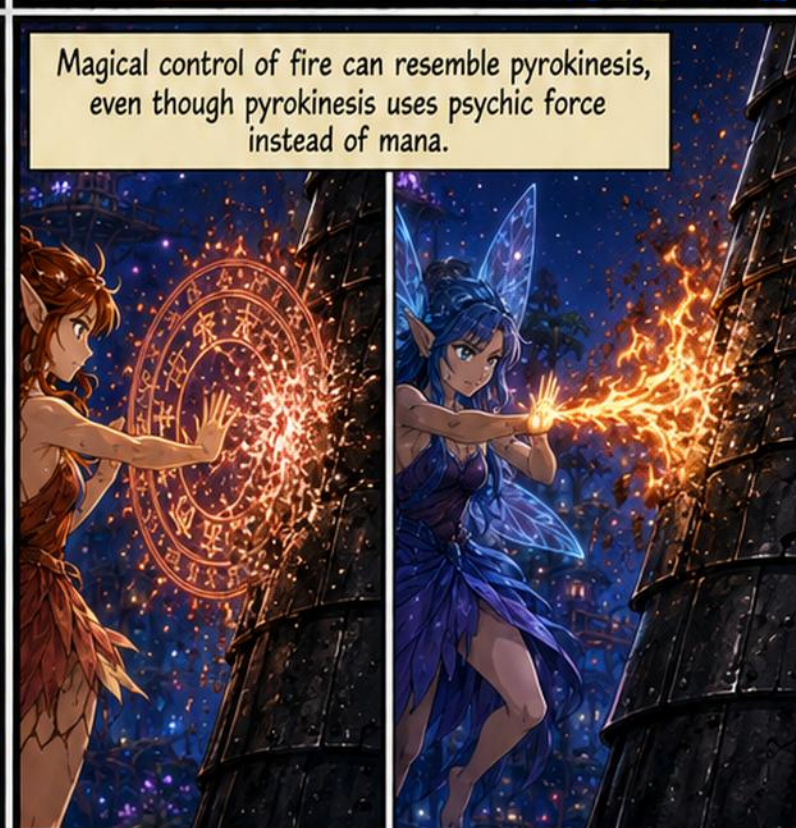

Then I noticed a contradiction:
anti-magic armor had not stopped
my Geomancy from moving it.

Perhaps the power I called Geomancy had never been magic at all.

Magical control of fire can resemble pyrokinesis,
even though pyrokinesis uses psychic force
instead of mana.

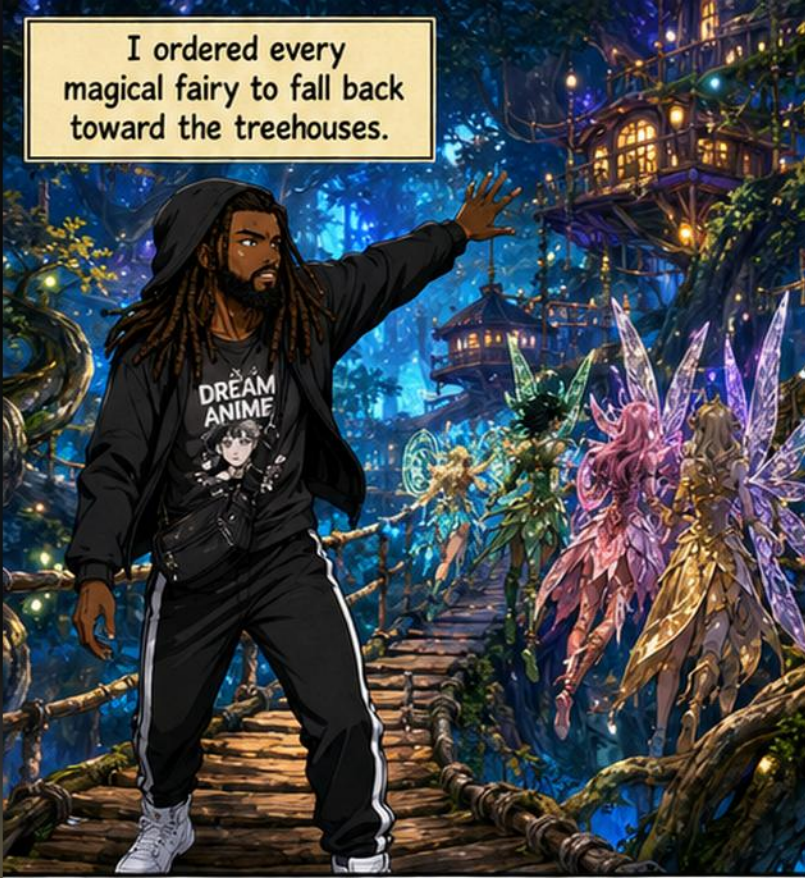

If my earth power was really Geokinesis,
sky iron had no reason to block it.

That distinction might apply to some of the fairies too.

I ordered every magical fairy to fall back toward the treehouses.

Then I called for every fairy whose power came from the mind to take the front line.

The pyrokinetic fairy gathered fire without a wand, rune, or spell.

The cryokinetic fairy focused cold into blades of ice.

The electrokinetic fairy shaped lightning through pure psychic force.

The armored frog charged, believing nothing in the village could hurt it.

The first pyrokinetic flame
struck the sky iron
and kept burning.

Psychic power was not magic,
so the armor could not erase it.

Cryokinetic ice froze
the frog's legs and trapped its dangerous tongue.

Electrokinetic lightning surged across every black plate.

The combined psychic storm
blasted the giant frog away from the village.

A defense built against magic had failed against the power of the mind.

The fairy village survived because we stopped treating every impossible power as the same thing.

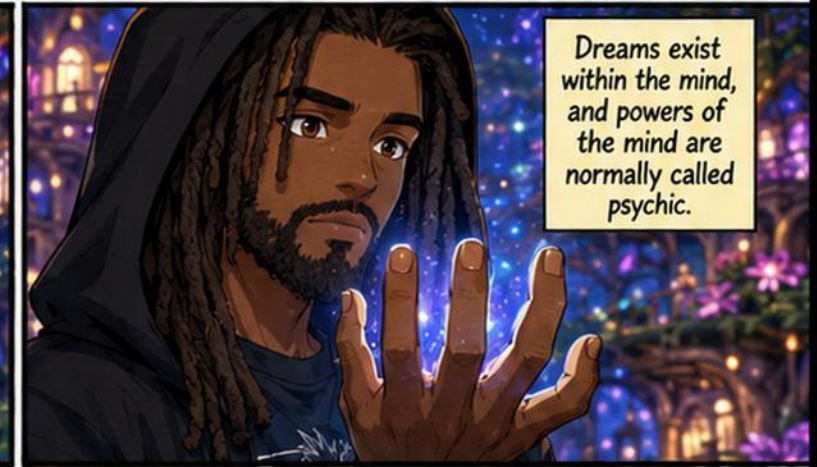

A failed plan had become evidence, and that evidence revealed the winning strategy.

I began to wonder whether any power I used in dreams was truly magic.

Dreams exist within the mind, and powers of the mind are normally called psychic.

Perhaps every spell I had ever named was another form of thought made real.

I did not know the answer, but the Storyverse had given me a new theory to explore.

