

THE ELECTRONIC EGG

JULY 12, 2026

I induced lucidity through sleep paralysis and arrived alone in the Storyverse, where every possible story exists inside a cosmic bubble.

Doctor Bear sat beside me on a red couch in space, and together we asked what it means to hold the power of a god.

I love Earth, even though some people there hate me simply because of who I am.

I would never smite them. But I could turn those who hate and destroy into people who love and create.

Changing cruelty into kindness sounds merciful, until I remember that rewriting a mind also steals its freedom.

In a dream I can control almost anything. Does anyone truly have free will when my thought can become their reality?

And yet dream people surprise me. They fear, decide, disagree, and offer choices I did not plan.

If their choices feel real, then my power must make room for them.

A sasquatch in a red jersey and blue cape flew past carrying what looked like a football.

I followed from curiosity, but he thought I meant to steal it.

Instead of overpowering his fear, I changed myself into a blue catlike form that felt familiar and safe.

We played catch, and trust replaced fear because neither of us forced it.

Then my new friend chose to give me the object: an electronic egg that connected realities and games.

The gift opened
before I could study
it, and the electronic egg pulled me
through itself.

I crossed realities
like levels in a game
and landed beside a team of superheroes.

Their enemy could manifest ideas into solid reality.

He created two
disasters at once:
a runaway train packed
with people, and a missile aimed at everyone trying to save them.

The strongest hero pushed against the train, but its manifested momentum only grew.

Another shattered the track by accident, making the danger worse.

Even my Lucid Light offered too many ways to erase the threat—and too many lives I might erase with it.

Raw power kept answering the wrong question.

Then Midnight Archer, the only hero without powers, noticed that the two threats could solve each other.

Midnight Archer fired one hacking arrow into the missile's guidance system.

Her arrow redirected the weapon away from us and toward the empty engine at the front of the train.

One precise idea destroyed both threats while the heroes shielded every passenger.

The villain fled from a mortal who had defeated his power with imagination.

Among godlike beings,
the powerless hero had been the one who understood the problem.

Empathy told her
whom to protect.
Creativity showed her how.

Back beside Doctor Bear,
I finally understood that power is not the same thing as wisdom.

The best use of godlike
power is not to command hearts, but to protect the space in which hearts can choose to change.

