

SOL AGAINST THE GHOST ARMADA

JULY 29, 2026

I became lucid through sleep paralysis and returned to the medieval village where my previous dream had ended.

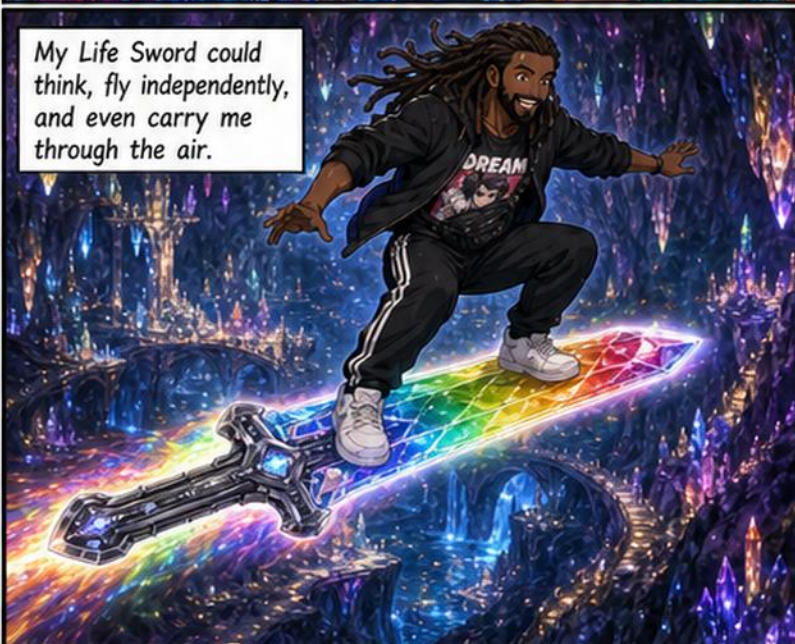

Near the surface, Life Crystals could be placed inside lifeless mirrors or golems and give those objects minds of their own.

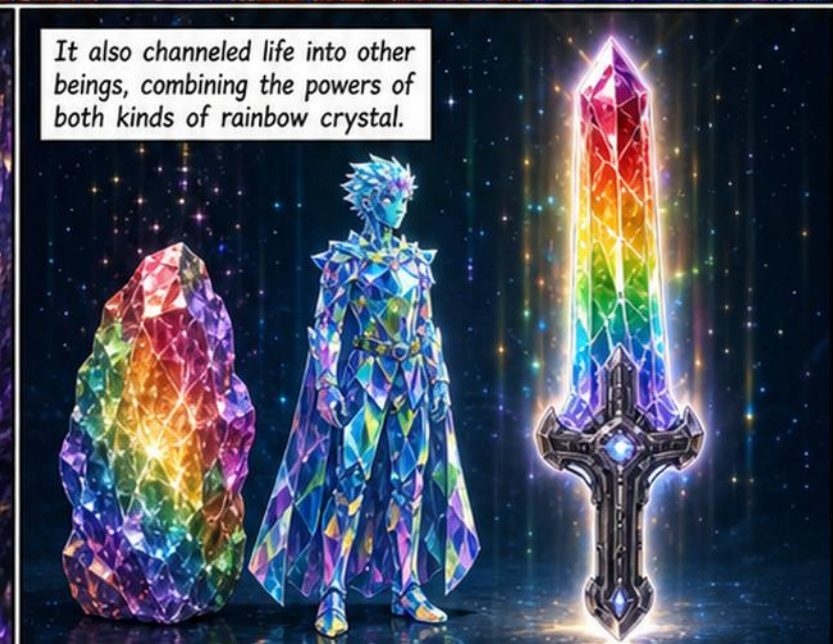

Far below, we found crystal people who needed no vessel. They were naturally alive and had built a civilization.

My Life Sword could think, fly independently, and even carry me through the air.

It also channeled life into other beings, combining the powers of both kinds of rainbow crystal.

Its futuristic systems completed the mystery: living crystal, life-giving crystal, and technology fused into one sword.

The Life Sword and Death Sword were the Storyverse's strongest artifacts, so news of the mines made this whole universe a target.

I bonded my mirror to the Blue Enchantress's mirror, creating a permanent emergency link.

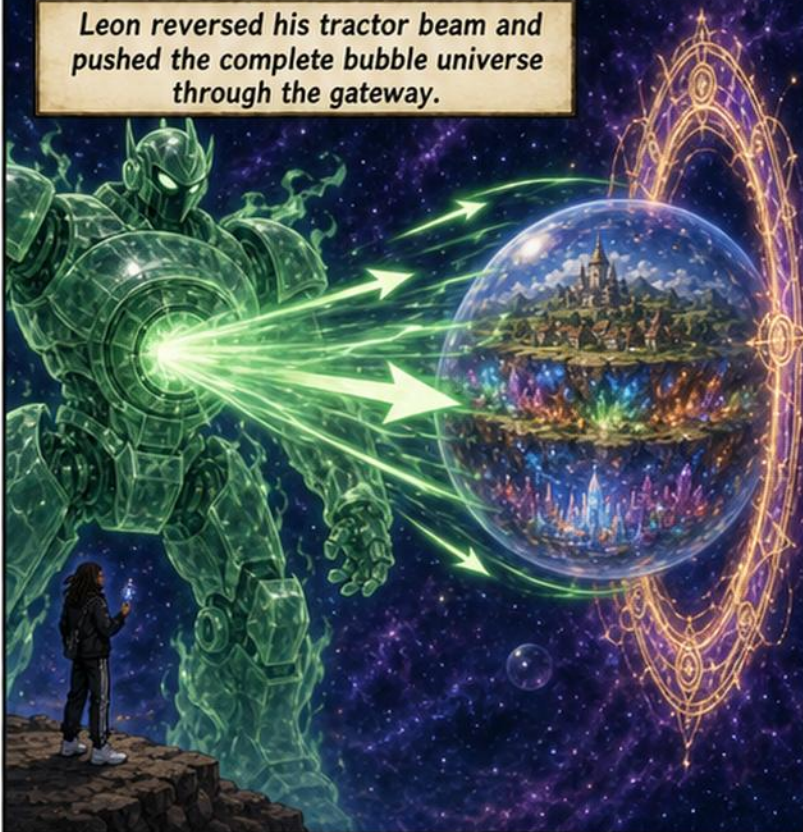

Then Leon, my ghostly green UFO, lifted me from the village and became an enormous spectral mecha.

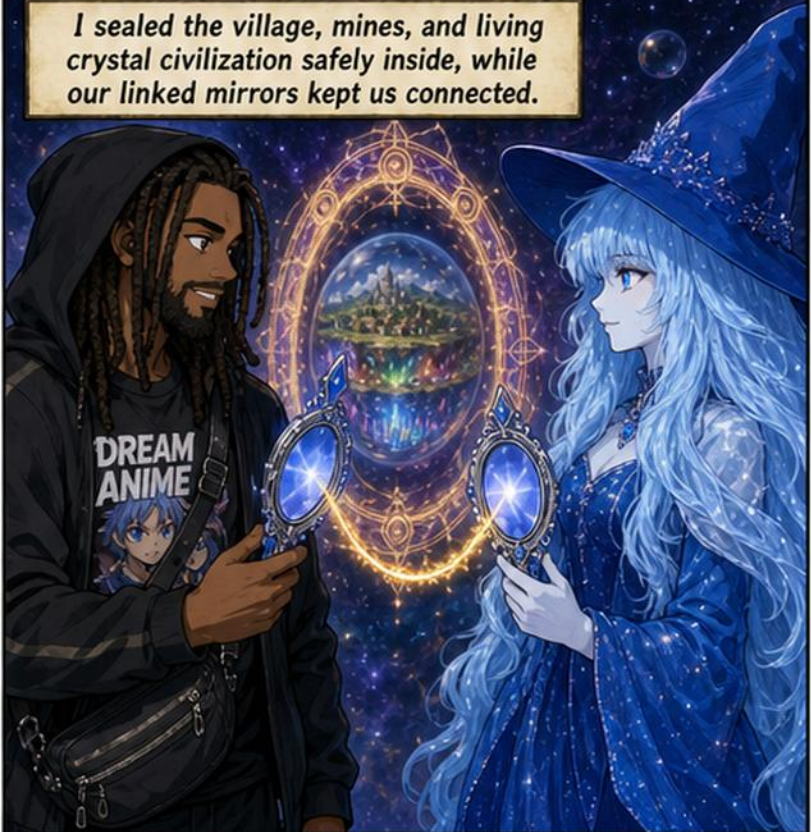

I opened Porta into a pocket dimension beyond the normal boundaries and travel routes of the Storyverse.

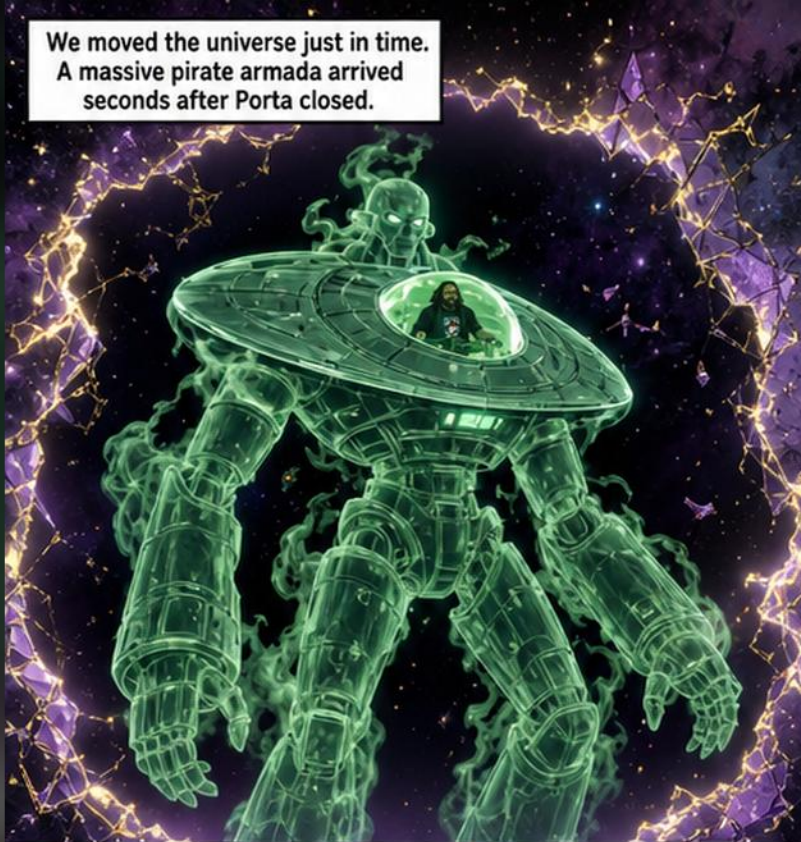

Leon reversed his tractor beam and pushed the complete bubble universe through the gateway.

I sealed the village, mines, and living crystal civilization safely inside, while our linked mirrors kept us connected.

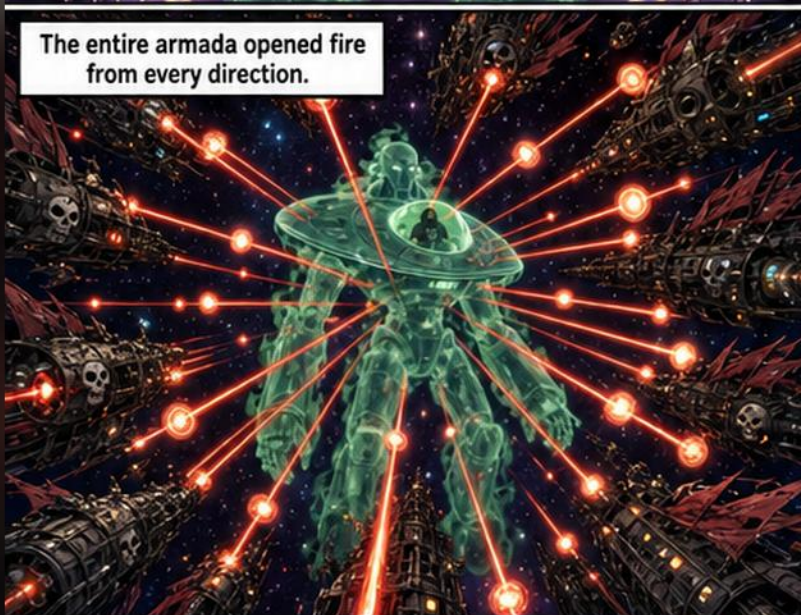

We moved the universe just in time.
A massive pirate armada arrived seconds after Porta closed.

Their treasure had vanished, so every surrounding ship aimed its laser cannons at Leon.

The entire armada opened fire from every direction.

Leon was a ghost. He became intangible, and every attack passed through him without causing harm.

Each projectile continued into a ship on the opposite side, so the pirates blasted their own fleet apart.

Then an enormous ghost cruiser emerged—and it made even Leon's universe-moving mecha look small.

The cruiser charged straight at us, and Leon warned that one ghost could not safely phase through another.

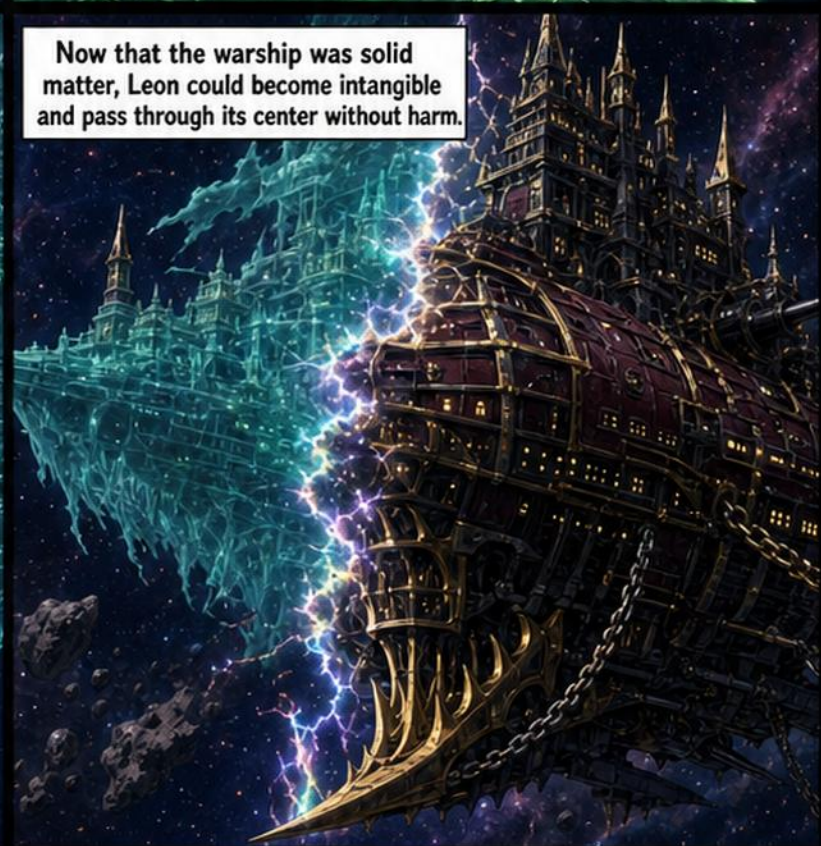

If their intangible bodies collided, the impact would tear Leon apart.

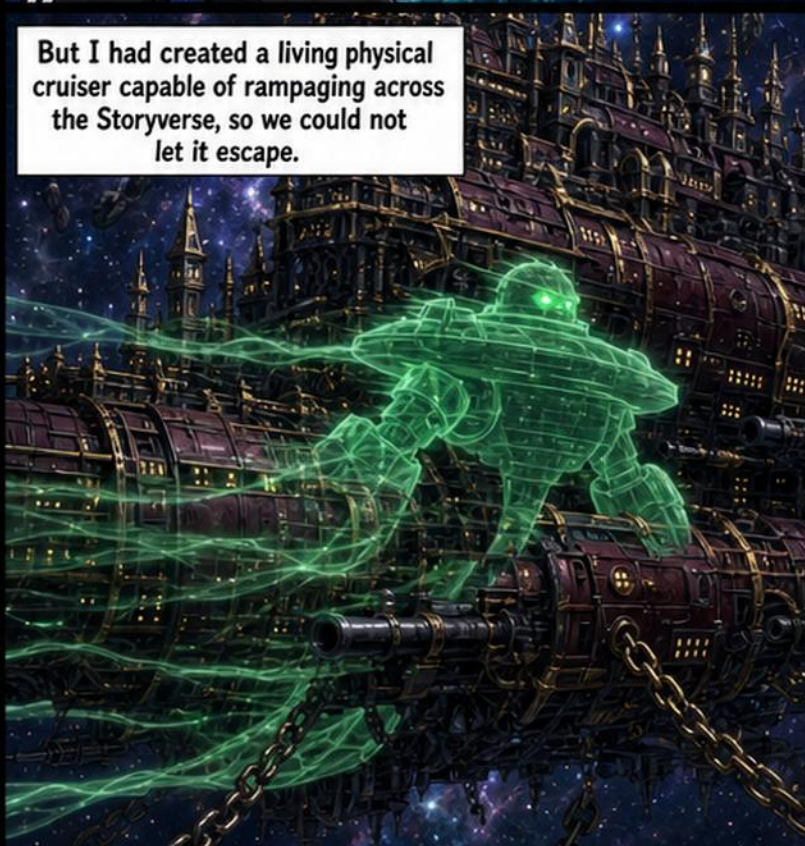

I fired the Life Sword's power into the cruiser and restored the spectral vessel to physical life.

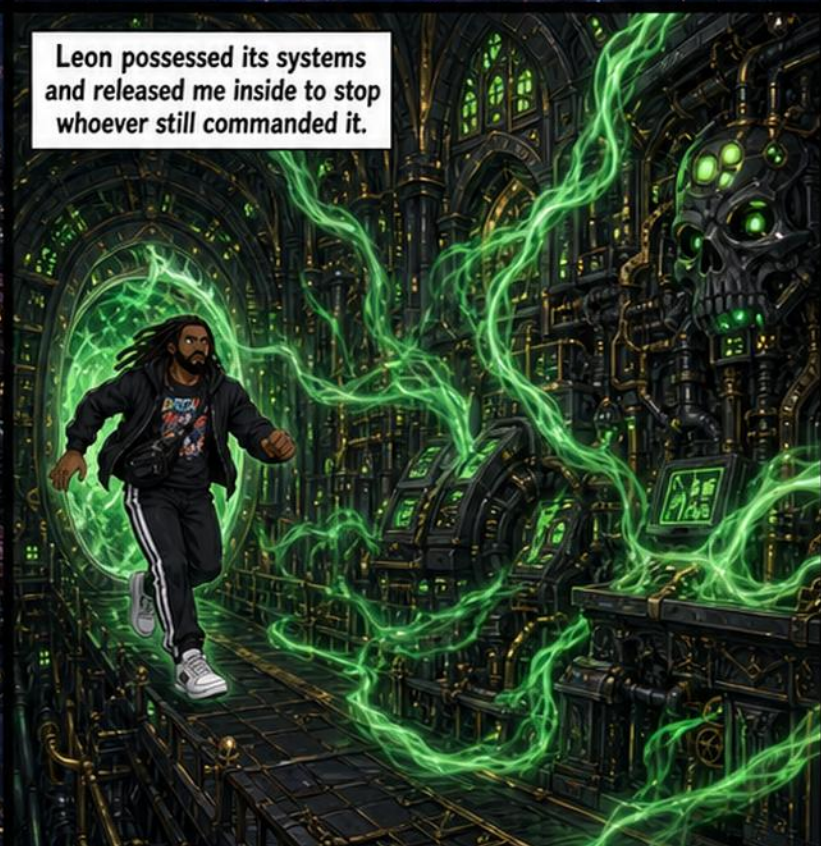

Now that the warship was solid matter, Leon could become intangible and pass through its center without harm.

But I had created a living physical cruiser capable of rampaging across the Storyverse, so we could not let it escape.

Leon possessed its systems and released me inside to stop whoever still commanded it.

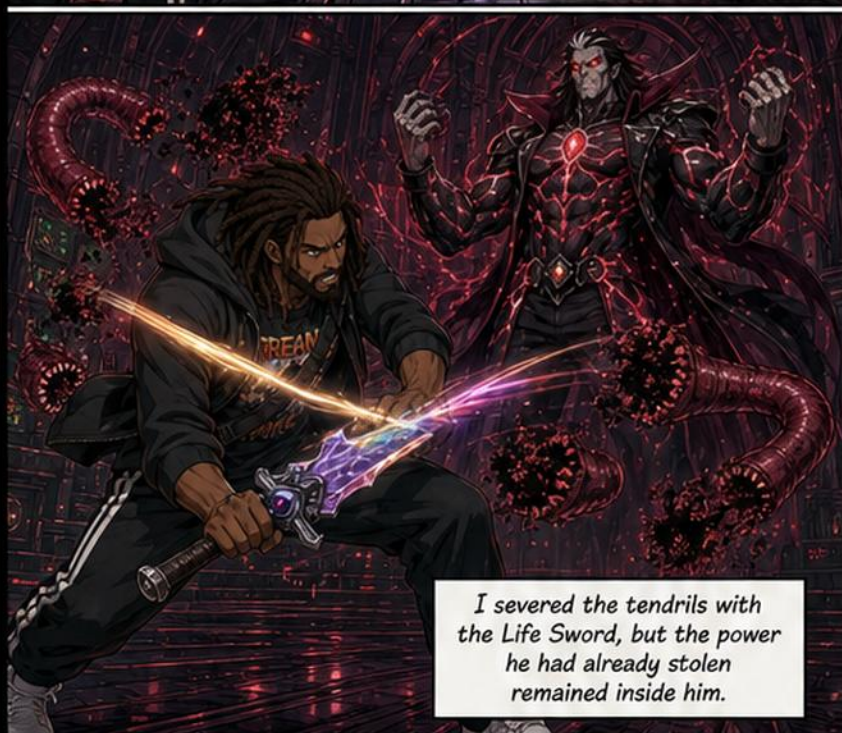

The captain was an undead space pirate whose claws and leech-like tendrils revealed his vampiric hunger.

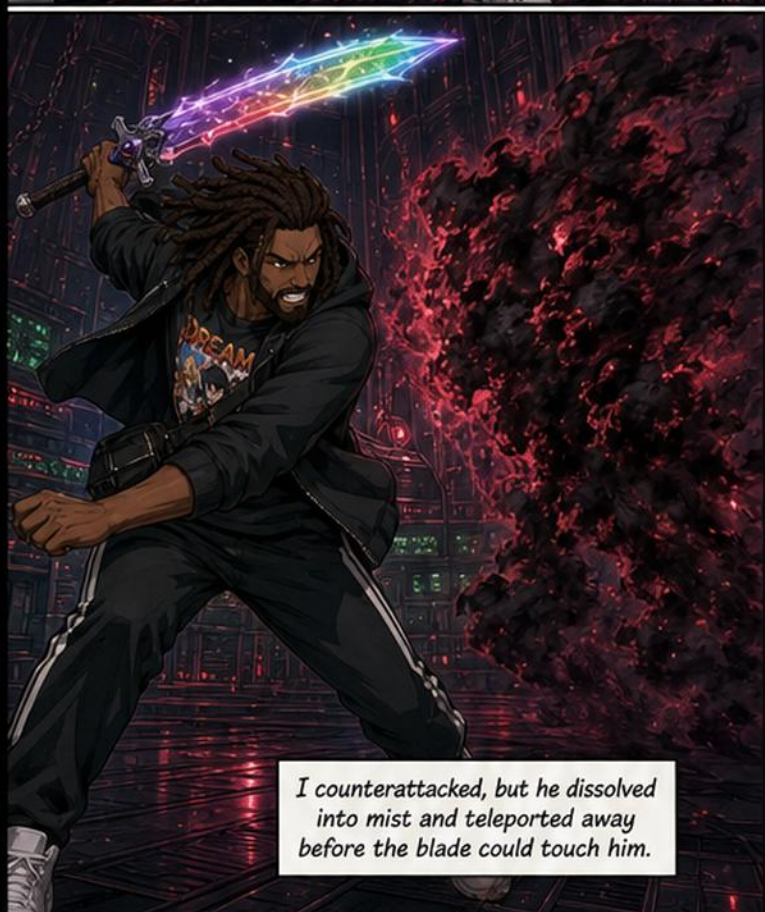

His tendrils drained my life energy, weakening my body while making him much stronger.

I severed the tendrils with the Life Sword, but the power he had already stolen remained inside him.

When his sharpened claws struck, I cast Aegis. My shield held, and his claws shattered against it.

I counterattacked, but he dissolved into mist and teleported away before the blade could touch him.

Every sword strike was too slow. I needed an attack that could reach him before he became mist.

Instead of shaping Lucid Light into armor, I concentrated its star-filled energy in my open hand.

I fired it like a laser, and the beam moved too quickly for the captain to evade.

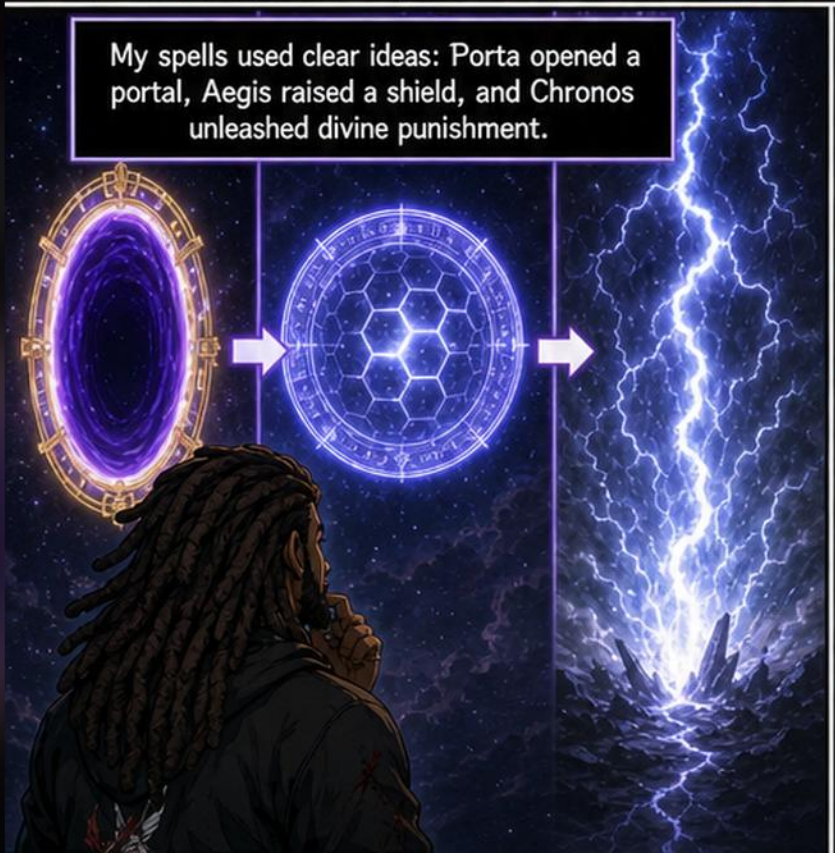

The attack stunned him before he could dissolve into mist, revealing a new use for one of my oldest powers.

Lucid Light created the opening, but a vampire's true weakness was sunlight.

My spells used clear ideas: Porta opened a portal, Aegis raised a shield, and Chronos unleashed divine punishment.

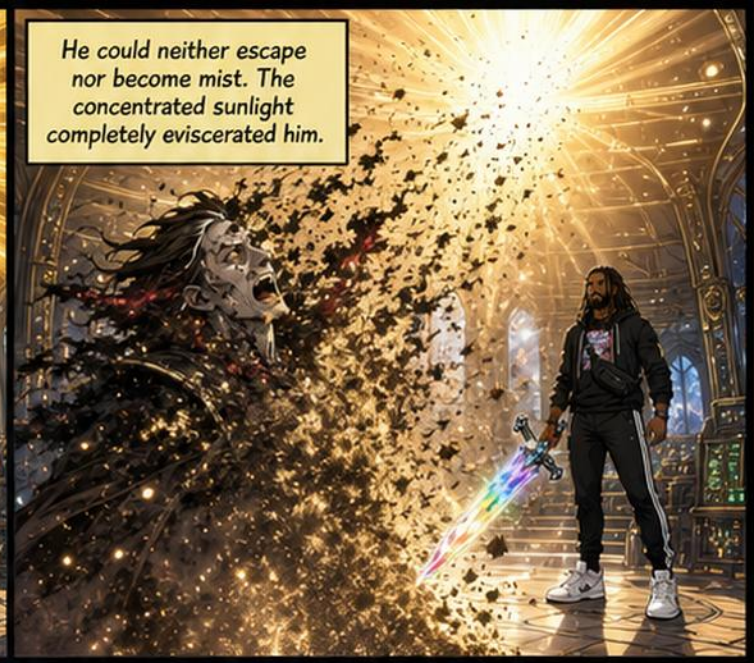

I knew the word for the power I needed. I raised my hand and cast a new spell: "Sol."

Sol created a miniature sun above the captain and filled the chamber with overwhelming natural daylight.

He could neither escape nor become mist. The concentrated sunlight completely eviscerated him.

With the captain defeated, Leon locked down every system and completed our capture of the colossal cruiser.

The Blue Enchantress, her village, the Life Crystal mines, and the living crystal civilization remained hidden.

I understood the living Life Sword more deeply, and our team had gained the largest captured vessel we had ever seen.

I carried two new abilities forward: an instantaneous Lucid Light laser and Sol, the spell that summons a sun.
