

DREAM
ANIME

THE RED-EYED DARKNESS

AUGUST 10, 2026

Flying through cities like a superhero is standard in many of my dreams.

I patrol from above for villains, monsters, or anyone who needs protection.

That night, a black water tower caught my attention because a gigantic black eye stared from its tank.

When I flew back to investigate, the tower grew until it dominated the city.

Its eye burned red, the world darkened, and a voice entered my mind: Was I scared?

The darkness did not merely surround me. It reached for Silonis.

The Rainbow Crystal Sword of Life is the most powerful artifact in the Storyverse.

I answered the reaching shadows with one decisive strike.

Wherever Silonis touched the corruption, blackness became brilliant white.

The darkness demanded to know what I had done to it.

I told it the truth: I was not afraid.

One of the Life Sword's primary powers is the purification of evil.

The corruption vanished as the darkness and its tower cracked apart.

If the entity was pure evil, purification would likely destroy it completely.

I left the breaking tower behind and continued across the rain-soaked sky.

Beyond the city, a forest trapdoor promised shelter from the storm.

Below the trapdoor waited a crafting table, bed, chests, and a home I somehow remembered.

It felt like an old house I once built inside Minecraft, even though this version included a refrigerator.

I had felt nostalgia for childhood homes before, but never so strongly for a place that began inside a game.

A doorway opened into a mine where thorny berry bushes grew between the torches.

I gathered their fruit and turned it into juice, jam, paste, and every recipe I could imagine.

Eventually, the darkness returned like a psychic symbiote seeping down from above.

It invaded the underground home and drove me toward the mine shaft.

For one moment, going deeper seemed like the obvious escape.

Then I remembered what could form in the shadows between widely spaced torches.

Running forward might only trade one monster behind me for many monsters ahead.

I did not have to accept either danger
as my only choice.

The mine was a path,
but it was not my path.

I flew upward and shaped sparkling purple Lucid Light around myself.

Reality-warping energy became a drill aimed straight through the ceiling.

Instead of following the tunnel, I began creating an exit of my own.

Lucid Light carried me through stone, soil, roots, and rain.

I broke through to the surface and left the darkness beneath me.

Courage had helped me face the tower, but judgment showed me
when to leave its trap.

No enemy could limit me to the routes
it expected me to take.

I flew beyond the sky, entered the Storyverse, and escaped by choosing a direction that had not existed until I made it.