

THE DIRECTOR OF AGENTIS

JULY 13, 2026

I induced lucidity through sleep paralysis and arrived alone in a futuristic corridor.

Instead of my usual hoodie and Dream Anime shirt, I wore a business suit tailored as if someone expected me.

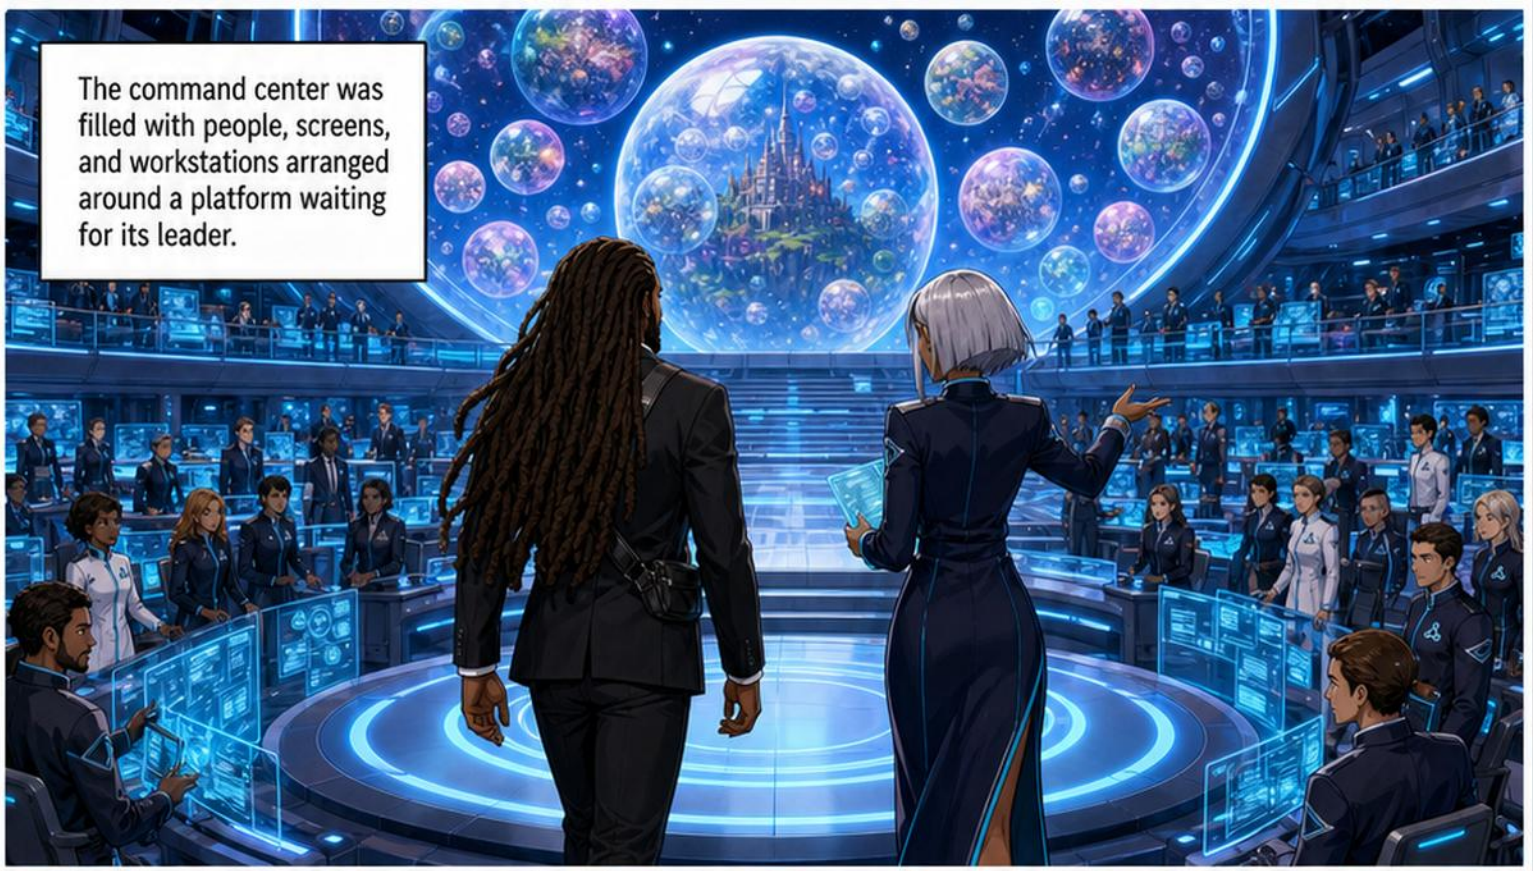

A woman greeted me with the confidence of someone who already knew my name and my destination.

She ushered me toward the command center of an organization called Agentis.

The command center was filled with people, screens, and workstations arranged around a platform waiting for its leader.

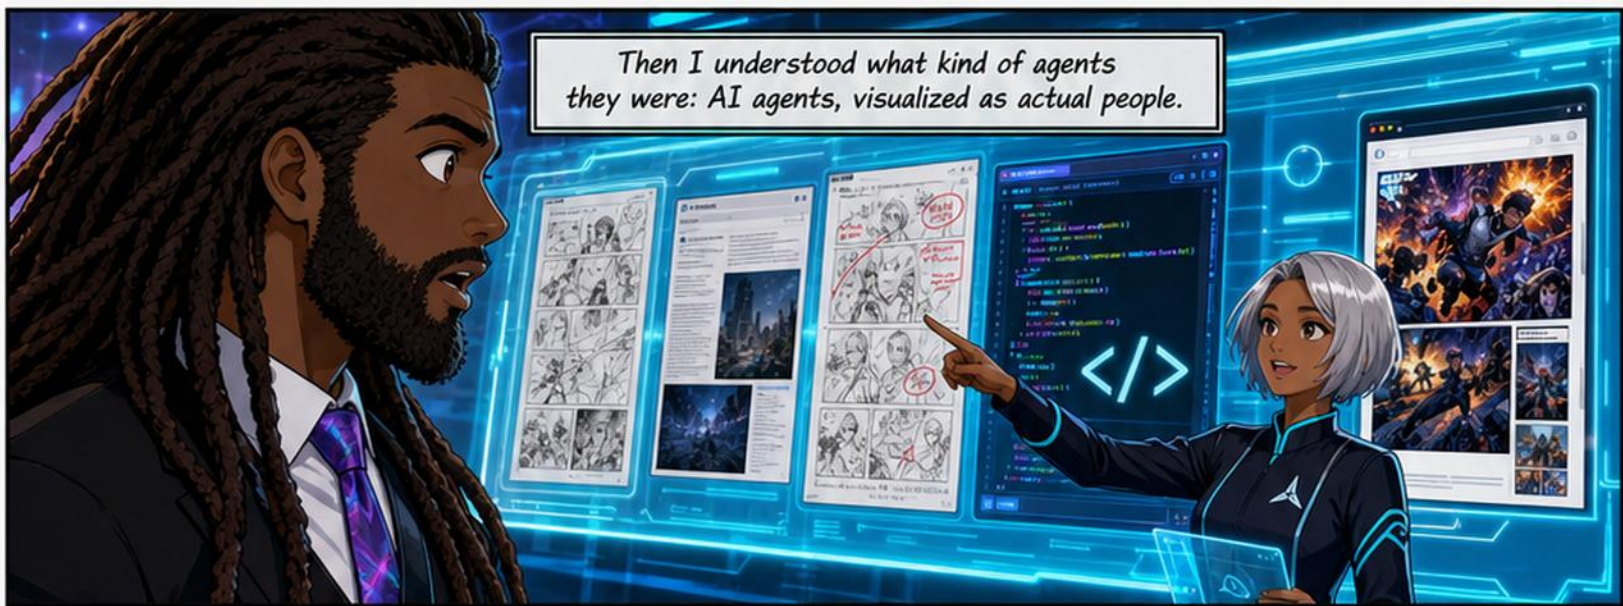

My guide identified me as the director of the entire organization.

I asked the obvious question: Was I the head of a spy organization?

She answered, "Not every organization of agents is an organization of secret agents."

Then I understood what kind of agents they were: AI agents, visualized as actual people.

One researched. One designed. One edited. Another prepared the result for publication.

Agents reflected my waking habit of using AI agents to help me get things done, especially to make comics.

It was the cyberspace equivalent of what I essentially do every day.

The familiar looked completely different when every tool stood in front of me as a person waiting for direction.

I still did not really know what Agentis did, because I had more available agents than defined jobs.

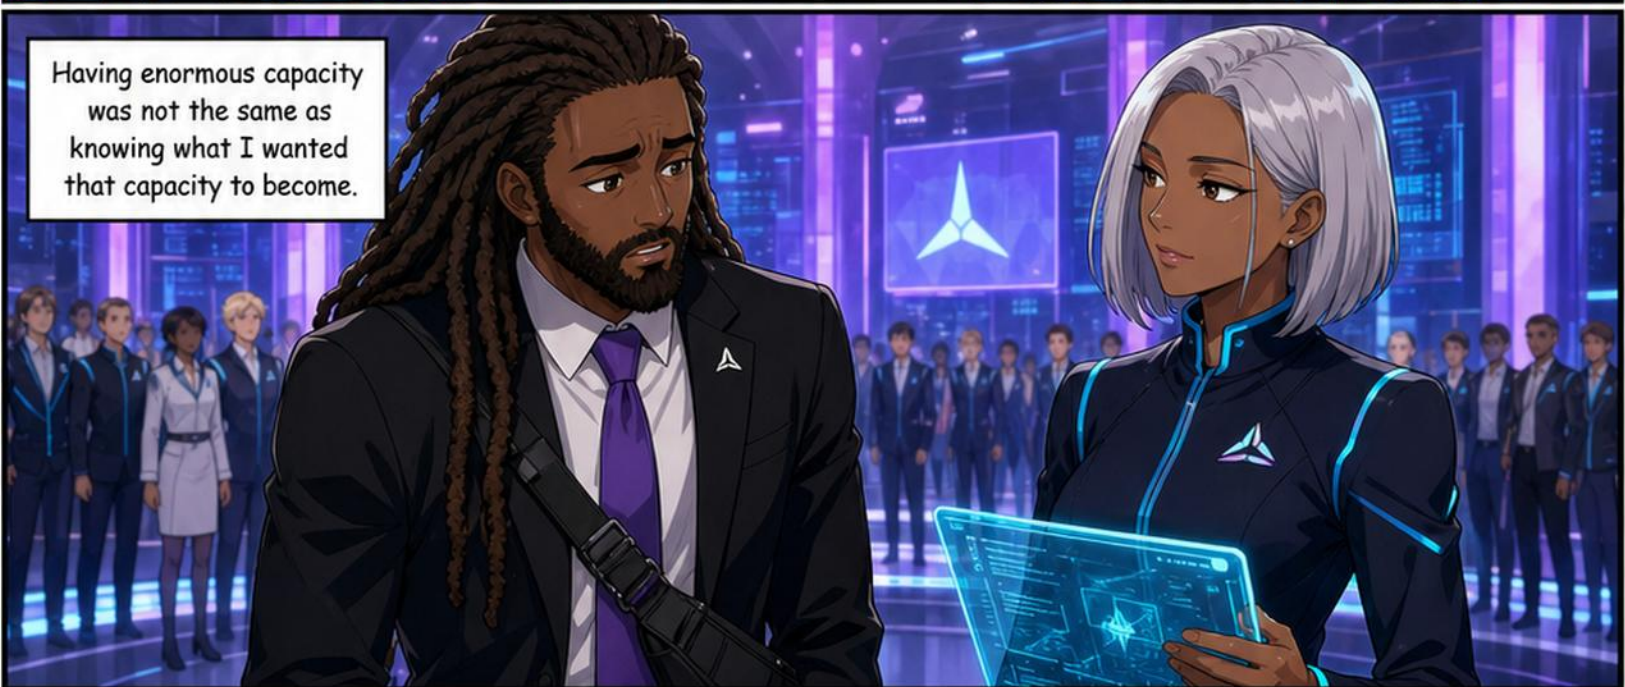

When they were only windows on a screen, I never had to picture all of them waiting for the next command.

Now it was obvious that I was not accustomed to using so many agents in parallel.

Having enormous capacity was not the same as knowing what I wanted that capacity to become.

Many people are becoming solopreneurs, using AI agents in place of employees to build companies.

I already published comics on a site with support options for people who wanted to donate.

I had not reached that point, and I did not know what I would do differently if I called my work a company.

Beyond that, I could imagine one place that brought more of my media landscape together—but I needed more time to think.

I did not need to invent a company merely because the command center made one possible.

I gave Agentis one honest assignment: map what I already make before deciding what else it should become.

One team organized the comics. One studied the existing site and its support options.

A third sketched ways that my other media might connect without forcing a final answer.

For the first time, parallel agents felt less like a crowd waiting on me and more like collaborators exploring a clear question.

The command center had not needed a grand purpose. It needed a direction small enough to begin.

My comics, support options, and possible future media were the same as before, but now I could see their relationships.

I still did not know exactly what Agentis would become, and I did not have to decide it all at once.

It is bizarre how different your current circumstances can appear when you choose to look at them differently.
