

THE DYNAMANCER INTERRUPTION

AUGUST 25, 2026

I became lucid
inside a God dream,
where I could create
and study an entire Storyverse world.

I wondered what
overnight event could make reality feel more
like a living comic book.

My answer was simple
and dangerous: let
modern technology
give ordinary people
literal superpowers.

Data centers cooled themselves with swamp water carrying traces of frog DNA.

Their pollution transformed people into humanoid frogs with powers tied to a single concept.

I called them Dynamancers—love, knowledge, and countless other ideas made physically real.

Some saw the Dynamancers as humanity's next
great era, powered
by imagination.

Others feared that
every new superhero
would also make room
for a supervillain.

Even literal superpowers
could not unite a world
already divided over
data centers.

Then I lost lucidity
and found myself at
a modern academy
filled with relics from
the 1990s.

Armored guards brought
a former school bully
into my dorm to repair
its failing monitors.

He had accidentally
killed someone, and
one signed release
form could restore
his freedom.

He wanted my signature
because good deeds were supposed to prove he deserved another chance.

Crying, I refused.
Redemption was possible,
but I could not be the person who granted it.

I compared him to a
demon-fighting character
whose life also depended on doing good.

The comparison became reality as red-and-blue symbiote tendrils transformed him into a demon.

He chased me through the dorm, turning everything he found into a weapon.

A motorized zip-line toy became my escape—and the weapon that sent him through a window.

The moment he fell, I returned to lucidity
above the frog world
I had created.

Nothing there had changed, though I
survived an entire
story while my
control was gone.

I watched the Dynamancers
once more, sensed morning
approaching, and chose
to wake.

