

THE SOULBOUND ESCAPE

AUGUST 23, 2026

I became lucid
inside the body of a prisoner I did not recognize.

Beyond the prison's
rocky desert, an evergreen forest
promised freedom.

An exoskeleton
let me shatter
ore-bearing stone
with my bare fists.

The orange pants named me a prisoner, but the harness made me dangerously strong.

I reasoned this man must have earned extraordinary trust through good behavior.

I refused to inherit his confinement. I turned from the rocks and ran.

The harness drove me faster than an ordinary man—but not faster than a bullet.

The warden fired once, and the strength-enhancing machine could not make me bulletproof.

As my borrowed body fell, I knew I was dying inside a dream.

Lucidity gave me one power the prison could never predict.

I summoned the Rainbow Crystal Sword of Life through my chest.

It split my departing soul from the dying body—then pulled me back inside.

I rose again,
resurrected by the
sword's command
over life.

The warden panicked.
No exoskeleton could explain what he had witnessed.

He activated the prison turret and ordered
it to erase the impossible.

I called the Life Sword's power into a shimmering crystal shield.

Every turret round struck rainbow light and deflected harmlessly away.

With the harness and the sword together, I launched myself beyond the prison walls.

The bullets faded behind me
as the rocky desert gave way to evergreen trees.

I had escaped the sentence,
the gunfire, and even death itself.

I disappeared into the forest
carrying no borrowed history—
only my freedom.
