

LIFE SWORD: SEA HAG SIEGE

JULY 20, 2026

I induced lucidity through sleep paralysis and arrived alone in a coastal Storyverse city, where I began flying like a superhero.

While exploring, I reunited with the blue slime creature I had once helped.

He could shapeshift, and since our last meeting he had become the crowned king of Atlantis.

Even the king of the sea could not defeat the monster poisoning his waters.

Pollution had mutated into a colossal kaiju, so my old ally and I prepared to confront it together.

The slime king grew even larger, and I climbed onto his shoulder so we could approach the pollution kaiju together.

I raised the rainbow crystal Life Sword, believing its life-giving power could cleanse the creature instead of merely destroying it.

Before I could strike, a sea hag flew past on a witch's broom and snatched the Life Sword directly from my hand.

She forced its energy into the dead and resurrected an army of skeletal pirate warriors across the city.

The kaiju still threatened the sea, and now one of the Storyverse's greatest artifacts was creating a second disaster.

I still had my golden energy tether, a lasso that could also carry power from one place to another.

I looped it around the stolen Life Sword and poured my sparkling Lucid Light through the golden line.

The surge shocked the sea hag through the sword, knocked her from her broom, and let me pull the blade back into my hands.

I drained the borrowed life energy from every resurrected pirate, collapsing the army and supercharging the Life Sword.

Then I released all that recovered power into the pollution kaiju.

The blast eliminated the monster and purified the sea, saving both the city and the slime king's kingdom.

The pollution explained the kaiju, but neither the slime king nor I understood why the sea hag had appeared during the battle.

She had died in the fall, yet her broom remained intact, so I bonded my tether to it and sensed that the broom knew its way home.

I let it carry me into a hidden treasure cove already guarded by skeletal pirates.

The treasure and raid plans revealed the truth: the hag had been hoarding riches and wanted a much larger undead army to pillage the city.

Her arrival during the kaiju battle had been a coincidence. She had simply recognized a chance to steal the Life Sword.

Inside the cove, the hag's humanoid red crab familiar attacked with cursed claws that might damage either my tether or the Life Sword.

I refused to risk those artifacts in direct combat, so I protected them and shaped my Lucid Light into a pair of glowing claws.

The crab fought like an armored warrior, and every swipe of his cursed pincers forced me backward.

Then the skeletal pirates stationed in the cove surrounded us, leaving me injured, outnumbered, and alone.

For a moment, it seemed that surviving the first battle had only carried me into a trap.

Then I remembered the magical bond I had formed with the hag's broom and commanded it to fight beside me.

The broom swept dust into the air, creating a smokescreen that blinded the pirates and their crab commander.

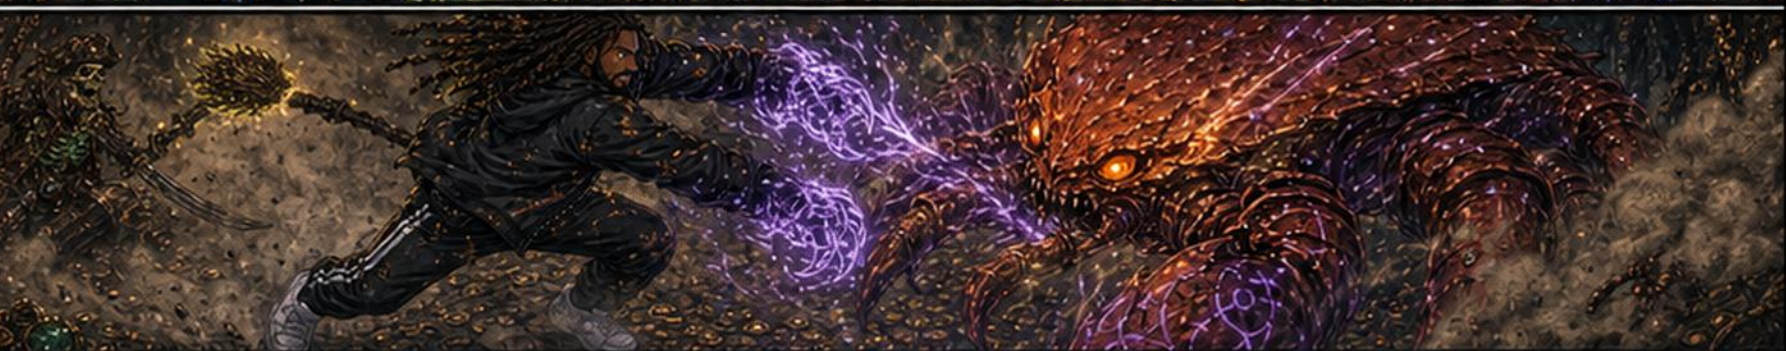

It wielded its wooden handle like a staff and almost single-handedly kept the entire skeletal garrison away from me.

That opening let me heal my injuries with the Life Sword without exposing the blade to the crab's cursed claws.

I attacked with my Lucid Light claws, and every impact sent another wave of intense heat through the familiar's shell.

The armor that protected him was becoming an oven he could no longer endure.

The repeated heat finally forced the crab familiar to molt and abandon the armored shell that had protected him.

Without that shell, one final strike from my Lucid Light claws defeated him.

At the same time, the enchanted broom overwhelmed the last skeletal pirates and ended the sea hag's remaining army.

My alliance with the slime king, the Life Sword, the golden tether, Lucid Light claws, and even the hag's own broom had each solved a different part of the crisis.

With every threat eliminated and both artifacts safe, I left the treasure cove above a city and sea that were finally secure.

