

ALPHA PLANET, TWO RAINFORESTS

JULY 24, 2026

I induced lucidity through sleep paralysis and entered the same Storyverse continuity I had explored since June 11, 2025.

I found myself moving through a vast corridor, although it may only have seemed enormous because I had been reduced to the size of a mouse.

A long-haired humanoid purple tiger woman saw me and began chasing me through the towering passage.

She was much larger than I was, and eventually her claws closed around me.

Because I knew I was dreaming, being caught did not make me feel intimidated.

I summoned my Lucid Light and constructed a gigantic humanoid tiger mech around my tiny body.

The mech grew until I towered over her, and she stared upward in sudden surprise.

Oh, Alpha. I did not recognize you, she said, mistaking my armor for the leader of her pack.

I shrank the mech to her height and dismissed it, revealing that I was not the Alpha at all.

Imposter, she shouted, but every wound from her claws closed immediately in the Rainbow Crystal Sword's healing light.

When she tried to steal the sword, I created a radiant rainbow barrier that made her attacks useless.

I told her I was leaving for an adventure and invited her to come with me, but I had no reason to stay while she kept attacking.

She refused. She insisted that her Alpha would want my sword and promised to take it for him.

Protected by the rainbow shield, I stopped arguing, flew upward, and crashed through the ceiling without being harmed.

Behind me, the entire planet opened and transformed into the enormous body of the Alpha, a gigantic purple tiger king.

His true form pursued me through space, but I accelerated beyond his reach.

In the cosmic emptiness, I created an ordinary wooden door with a metal knob, opened it, and stepped into another reality.

The door opened into a dense rainforest where tropical trees had strange, smoothly rounded canopies.

The entire landscape was tinted blue, and snow fell through broad leaves, vines, and ferns as if the Amazon had entered winter.

I found a cave containing a river of lava and followed its glowing current deeper underground.

The lava's heat kept me warm while only a faint trace of the cold wind reached me from outside.

I rested beside the molten river until a brief waking interruption pulled me away from the dream.

I returned to sleep quickly, frustrated by the interruption, and tried to reconstruct the dream from the point where it had broken.

The second version did not repeat perfectly: the planet no longer transformed into the Alpha, although the wooden door in space remained.

Beyond it, the same tropical rainforest was now experiencing autumn instead of winter.

Orange, red, and yellow leaves filled the round canopies and blanketed the ground in a mild, comfortable climate.

I found the cave again and followed the familiar river of lava into its depths.

This time I did not merely rest beside the current. I stepped directly into it and let the lava cover me.

The lava did not burn me. It spread across my skin and transformed every part of my body without causing pain.

I emerged as living fire and molten stone, still myself but filled with the power of the volcanic river.

The transformation felt like transcendence, as though I had become a god of lava.

I flew out of the cave and rose high above the autumn rainforest.

From the sky, I remembered how the same rounded treetops had looked beneath snow and a blue atmosphere.

The winter and autumn versions of the world began to overlap and merge inside my mind.

I moved between the two visions like a photographer without a camera, carefully framing every detail with my attention.

I studied the snowy rainforest first: blue air, falling white flakes, and round tropical treetops that should not have belonged to winter.

Then I studied the same landscape in autumn, glowing red and gold above a ground covered with fallen leaves.

Neither version replaced the other. The matching paths, cave, and lava river allowed both impossible seasons to remain connected.

The interruption had changed the dream, but reconstructing it had created a second world worth remembering.

As the dream ended, I preserved both rainforests together inside my memory.
