

THE PORTAL-BLADE ASSASSIN

AUGUST 17, 2026

This dream began
in my magical study,
where I was thinking about the most powerful swords in
the Storyverse.

A normal blade
could carry Viva, Vita, Porta, or another spell and
become genuinely
magical.

But Silonis was more than an
inscription: living
crystal, life magic,
and future
technology acted
as one.

That meant other
legendary crystal-tech
swords could exist—
and portal magic
suggested where
to look.

I imagined
a planet made
from crystals that
naturally opened
portals.

Civilizations would mine those gems to
build shipping gates,
teleporters, and
automated Porta
technology.

But every crystal
could connect to
anywhere, allowing
any creature or catastrophe to appear without warning.

The miners would need heroes beside
them—because the
most valuable world
might also be the most dangerous.

As I wrote the theory down, an unseen adversary appeared, struck me, and vanished.

Every slash inside the dream arrived with a coughing fit in my physical body.

I could feel both realities at once, but the attacker moved too quickly for sight alone.

Someone was using the very portal-crystal blade I had just discovered.

I stopped trying to see the assassin and asked Silonis to sense their life energy.

The Life Sword revealed where their living presence would reconnect with the room.

Before each portal opened, I already knew where the next blade would appear.

I did not become faster than the assassin.
I became aware sooner.

Our blades collided again and again, yet the assassin disappeared after every failed strike.

Then I understood: portal swords might connect ideas and minds, not only physical places.

A hidden clan could sense anyone discovering their secret—and silence that person before the knowledge spread.

Portal gems were not rare. Portal blades were rare because their guardians made understanding dangerous.

I answered their portal blade with Porta, opening a path
to the Empty Dimension.

One final parry redirected
the assassin through it without killing them.

Their own sword could
reopen the path immediately.
This dimension was not a locked prison.

Even so, I believed
they would choose
not to come back.

The Empty Dimension
offered solitude, freedom,
and the right to exist
without judgment.

I could not remain there forever because both the waking world and the Storyverse still mattered
to me.

But the assassin knew
only one world—and had
spent that life hiding,
hunting, and running.

I gave them the power to return. Peace began when they finally found
no reason to use it.
