

THE
DINOSAUR
CHEF'S
LAST COURSE

AUGUST 1, 2026

I induced lucidity through sleep paralysis and entered a dense prehistoric jungle.

A small green-and-orange dinosaur stood before me, staring blankly without the slightest aggression.

Then a woman approached in a wicker dress and a wide sun hat covered with dangling red berries.

Her face was completely hidden in shadow; only her glowing red eyes could be seen.

She casually offered me bacon, then asked whether I had ever tasted dinosaur bacon.

Her real proposal was simple and terrible: kill the harmless dinosaur, and she would cook it for me.

The woman revealed an entire outdoor kitchen hidden among the ancient plants and confirmed that she was a Dinosaur Chef.

She claimed dinosaur meat was incredible, while the berries hanging from her hat were what made it taste good.

When I questioned that contradiction, she admitted the meat tasted like spoiled poultry without the berries.

I suggested that she skip the dinosaur and eat the berries—or combine them with some other food.

She insisted that I could understand only by killing and eating the creature myself.

I refused. The dinosaur was innocent, the food sounded unpleasant, and taking its life would be a waste.

My refusal transformed her invitation into a threat.

She drew a large kitchen knife and demanded that I kill the dinosaur—or face trouble myself.

I placed myself between the blade and the harmless creature and answered, "No."

Without warning, she stabbed me, expecting pain to force my obedience.

I summoned Silonis, my rainbow crystal Sword of Life, and its restorative energy sealed the wound.

Violence could not compel me. Whatever injury she caused, Silonis could make me whole again.

The Chef claimed that eating dinosaurs had made her big and strong—and then her body began to grow.

She towered above the jungle and raised one enormous foot to crush me.

Silonis formed a faceted rainbow crystal barrier that caught her full weight before the stomp could reach me.

Above the glowing shield, her foot changed into the clawed limb of a giant reptile.

The transformation spread until she became an enormous humanoid dinosaur, still wearing her wicker dress and berry-covered hat.

Her strange dream logic finally became clear: "You are what you eat."

I dropped the shield and used Lucid Light to back-dash beyond her descending foot.

From a safe distance, I summoned Tetheron, my golden energy tether.

The glowing lasso encircled both the Dinosaur Chef and the small dinosaur, magically bonding their minds.

The animal's memories carried every moment when she had cooked dinosaurs in front of their living companions.

She experienced their fear, grief, and horror from the inside, as though every emotion belonged to her.

Now transformed into a dinosaur herself, she finally cried, "What have I done?"

The memories overwhelmed her, and for one moment she looked genuinely horrified by the lives she had taken.

I told her that remorse could become a new choice: stop hunting dinosaurs and cook the berries with something else.

She could create a different food with the flavor and texture she wanted, without causing more suffering.

But empathy revealed the harm without erasing the hunger she still chose to obey.

She snarled, "Meat is everything," and fixed her glowing red eyes directly on me.

Then she chose her next meal: "I can eat you."

When she tried to seize me, I surrounded my body with a complete suit of sparkling Lucid Light armor.

Its propulsion ignited, and I blasted upward before her claws could close.

The Dinosaur Chef stretched after me, but her transformation had a fixed limit: she could not grow forever, and she could not fly.

Our confrontation became a simple contest of height, and I rose far beyond her reach.

I left her towering over the jungle—powerful, unrepentant, and unable to make her choice become mine.

With my freedom and principles intact, I accelerated out of the prehistoric world and flew into the Storyverse.

